[a] Conditional sale.—The lien of the legacy will be divested in spite of a written condition of sale, not in the order, by which the legacies ship of mortgagor and mortgagee may, however, be created between the heir and a creditor purchasing, by an agreement at the time of sale or prior thereto that the property shall be held as security for the debt and to convey upon its payment,[49] and a purchaser may also charge himself as trustee for heirs by a prior agreement to hold as such in case he purchases.[50]

A misdescription in the deed by which an administrator sought to convey land pursuant to a proceeding to subject it to sale for the purpose of paying the debts cannot be taken advantage of by an heir of the deceased owner.[51]

Where the heirs or devisees are not made parties to the proceeding in which land of decedent is sold, they are, according to some authorities, not divested of their title so as to be precluded from asserting it in another proceeding.[52]

[§ 1691] b. Dower or Curtesy Rights.[53] As a widow's dower is not usually subject to the general debts of the husband,[54] her right to dower, or to a statutory estate in the nature thereof, is not usually divested by an administration sale,[55] although under some statutes the rule is otherwise.[56] Statutes were to remain charges, the purchaser having no actual notice of the condition. Randolph's App., 5 Pa. 242.

[a] Illustrations. — (1) Where land in controversy was devised to testator's sons for life, remainder to their legitimate children, a sale thereof by the executor to pay debts after the sons had been put in possession, in which no jurisdiction was acquired of existing remaindermen, did not bar their rights in the property. Trimble v. Rice, 204 Fed. 407, 122 CCA 658. (2) Where a husband devised certain property to his wife for life, with remainder to his children, and the wife renounced under the will, and homestead and dower were set apart to her, and thereafter the property was sold to pay debts on the petition of the wife as executrix, in which proceedings the children were not made parties, the wife had no interest in the property so sold, and when thereafter one of the children died, and the mother inherited one half of his interest in the land and died, such interest of the surviving child was not affected by the sale to pay debts. Rice v. Bamberg, 68 S. C. 184, 46 SE 1009. (3) Where a testator devised land to his widow for life, with remainder to devisees named, and in proceedings to sell the land for the payment of the testator's debts, the widow was made a party, but the devisees were omitted, the devisees were not bound by the judgment directing a sale, on the ground that the widow represented them in the proceedings, especially where she had dissented from the will and did not own as a devisee any estate which would be affected by the will. Card v. Finch, 142 N. C. 140, 54 SE 1009 (the facts that testator owed debts and his land was liable for their payment, and the land sold pursuant to the decree brought a fair price, and the proceeds were properly applied did not defeat the right of the devisees collaterally to attack the decree, and to recover the land subject to the right of the purchaser to repayment of the amount which he had expended, for which the land was liable).

[b] Minor heir.—(1) Where land belonging to an estate is sold to pay debts, but a minor heir is not legally summoned, a subsequent warranty deed from the widow, who was the purchaser, is not binding upon the minor, even though she is his mother, and he not estopped to claim his interest in the land. Manternach v. Studt, 230 Ill. 356, 82 NE 829, 120 AmSR 310. (2) The acquiescence of the creditors and the major heirs in an administration by the tutrix of minor heirs does not enlarge her powers as to the minors nor remove the restrictions relating to the alienation of their immovable property. Deshotels v. Lafleur, 134 La. 1052, 64 S 905.

[c] The fact that the heirs resided in the vicinity of lands from the time of an administrator's sale, and during subsequent transactions and sales thereof, does not estop them from claiming the land on the ground of fraud in the administrator's sale, where they were in no position to know the title to the land and were not parties to any of the transactions. [c] If the administrator of the husband was also the administrator of the widow, her interest, being a fee simple in a certain part of her husband's real estate, does not pass by the sale where it does not appear that the administrator, in making the sale, acted otherwise than as administrator of the husband. Elliott v. Frakes, 90 Ind. 389.

sometimes permit the land to be sold free from dower, and the widow compensated from the proceeds of the sale,[57] and where the purchasers at a sale by an administrator under order of the court of land devised to the intestate's widow have paid in cash the adequate value of the property in reliance upon the probate proceedings, and they are not void, the purchasers take the land from the estate free from any charge in favor of the widow.[58] If the widow is a party to the proceedings leading to the sale, the decree is an adjudication against her unless it assigns dower or reserves her rights.[59] A sale to satisfy a debt to which the dower estate is subject discharges dower,[60] and where a widow purchases all her deceased husband's property, her dower interest becomes merged in the fee thus acquired.[61] Questions sometimes arising between the purchaser and the heirs after the death of the widow as to the right to land assigned as dower must be determined from the description in the record and in the deed.[62]

An estate by the curtesy is an encumbrance subject to which a sale will be made.[63]

[§ 1692] c. Encumbrances.[64] Under some statutes administration sales are made subject to encumbrances on the land which existed at the time of decedent's death, which remain charges thereon,[65] while under others the property is sold free

Zook's App., 54 Pa. 486.

[b] A mortgagee cannot be required to come into chancery under proceedings for the sale of a decedent's real estate and seek payment of his claim out of the proceeds of sale, but may rely on his mortgage. Ellicott v. Ellicott, 6 Gill & J. (Md.) 35.

[e] Agreement with purchaser as to discharge of encumbrances.—An agreement made by the administrator with the purchaser that the amount of a mortgage on the land sold should be paid out of the purchase money does not affect the lien of the mortgage, but the purchaser takes subject to it, where it was not referred to it in the petition or order of sale and the mortgagee was not made a party to the proceeding to sell. Crum v. Meeks, 128 Ind. 360, 27 NE 722.

[f] Failure of purchaser to give bond to pay liens.—On a sale subject to liens the purchaser takes subject thereto, although he fails to give a bond, as required by statute, conditioned that he will pay them. Massey v. Jerauld, 101 Ind. 270.

[g] If the administrator pays a of encumbrances, the lien of which is transferred from the land to the proceeds.[66] It is held, however, that there can be no such divesting of a vendor's lien, with which the land was charged when it came into the hands of decedent,[67] or of a mortgage executed by decedent's predecessor in title, securing a debt which was not, and did not become, a debt of decedent.[68] But it is otherwise where the mortgage debt, although not contracted by decedent, was assumed by him as a personal obligation in connection with his purchase of the land, and was included in the schedule of his debts for payment of which the sale is made.[69] A sale for the purpose of paying liens discharges all liens, although the proceeds are insufficient to pay the debts secured,[70] but the sale is subject to liens when made for purposes of distribution and not to pay debts.[71] In order that existing liens on the land may be divested by the sale it is considered necessary that the lienholders shall be parties to the proceedings leading up thereto.[72] A purchaser or mortgagee under license of the court cannot be subjected to a claim against the estate interposed after the sale or mortgage.[73]

[§ 1693] d. Leasehold Interest. The interest of a lessee is not divested by a sale for the payment of debts of the deceased lessor, although such lessee waived the issuance and service of a citation and consented to the sale of the property, where no direction was made for the sale of the right or interest of such lessee.[74]

[§ 1694] e. Rights of Purchasers from and Creditors of Heirs and Devisees. An administration sale under order of court will divest the title of a purchaser from the heir or devisee of the land,[75] as well as the lien of mortgages given by the heir

[b] A tax lien (1) may be thus divested. Herrington v. Tolbert, 110 Ga. 528, 35 SE 687. See also Smith v. Cornell, 111 N. Y. 554, 19 NE 271 [rev 51 N. Y. Super. 354] (where an heir purchased at a sale made by a trustee to satisfy dower, and afterward it was adjudged that trusts created by the will were void, and that he took as heir, the executor was not relieved from the statutory duty of paying taxes assessed previous to testator's death, although the dower sale was nominally subject to unpaid taxes); Henry v. Horstick, 9 Watts (Pa.) 412 (taxes which are not charges upon the land but which the purchaser has been compelled to pay to avoid distress of personal property upon the land may, it seems, be recovered back from the heirs, but the administrator is not liable therefor). (2) The purchaser is chargeable with taxes from the time rents accrue. Merrick v. North, 28 La. Ann. 878.

[c] Claim under trust deed not presented for allowance.—Under a statute providing that a mortgage or lien creditor of a decedent whose claim has been allowed or established by suit may obtain an order from the probate court for the sale of the mortgaged property by applying in writing and citing the administrator, all claims against a decedent's estate must be asserted in the probate court, whether secured or not, and although the lien is for the purchase price, so that one purchasing land from an administrator, acting under the approval of the probate court, would have a good title as against one claiming under a deed of trust, executed by decedent, where the trust deed claimant had never presented his claim to the probate court. [a] Estate of purchaser at sale.—One who purchases at an administration sale acquires an equitable estate in the land which constitutes a defense in ejectment by the grantee of heirs with notice. Long v. Joplin Min., etc., Co., 68 Mo. 422.

[b] Reconveyance to grantor of ancestor.—Where one tenant in common conveyed his half interest in the land to the other, and, after the death of the latter, his heirs reconveyed the same half interest to the grantor for the expressed reason that there was no valid consideration for or devisee[76] or of judgments against him.[77] Title acquired under condemnation proceedings against the heirs is, however, superior to that acquired by a purchaser under a subsequent sale by an administrator.[78]

Improvements. A purchaser from the heir or devisee is not entitled to a lien for improvements made by him when his estate is divested by a sale to pay the debts of decedent.[79]

If the sale does not take place within the period fixed by statute the estate of purchasers from the heir will not be divested.[80]

Satisfaction of liens by purchaser. A purchaser from the heir is entitled to reimbursement for money paid by him in satisfaction of liens or encumbrances on the property which existed at the time of decedent's death.[81]

[§ 1695] 3. Effect of Recognizing Lien. The sale of an equity in mortgaged premises belonging to an intestate under a general license of the probate court does not establish the validity of the mortgage.[82]

[§ 1696] 4. Title and Rights of Purchaser[83]—a. In General. The purchaser at a sale by an executor or administrator under order of court takes such title as decedent had at the time of his death,[84] and nothing more,[85] and hence, if decedent had no the former conveyance, a subsequent sale of the land under order of court to pay decedent's debts passed only his one-half interest therein. Gilbert v. Hopkins, 204 Fed. 196, 122 CCA 440.

[a] Enforcement of judgment against debtor's share of proceeds.—The lien of a judgment against the heir may be enforced against any share of the proceeds of the sale to which the heir would be entitled. Sears v. Mack, 2 Bradf. Surr. (N. Y.) 394.

[b] The title of a purchaser at an execution sale on a judgment against the heir will be divested of title by a subsequent sale to pay the ancestor's debts. Horner v. Hasbrouck, 41 Pa. 169. But compare Loudon v. Robertson, 5 Blackf. (Ind.) 276 (where the court was, apparently, of the contrary view, although the case was decided on other grounds).

[c] A sale for the benefit of the heirs and not to pay debts will not affect the title acquired by a purchaser at execution sale on a judgment against the heir. Swift v. Kenison, 39 Vt. 473. But compare McDaniel v. Edwards, 56 Ga. 444 (sale for distribution under order of court discharges lien of judgment against devisee).

[d] A fortiori, a creditor of an heir, who has secured no lien on the heir's interest in the land cannot assert an interest therein as against the purchaser. Yeaton v. Barnhart, 78 Or. 249, 150 P 742, 152 P 1192.

[a] Land conveyed to decedent as security.—If the only interest which decedent had in the land was as mortgagee, the purchaser acquires only that interest. Van Vleck v. Enos, 88 Hun 348, 34 NYS 754.

[b] The possession of one under a bond for title given by decedent is adverse to a purchaser at an administrator's sale, and the sale is therefore void. Heard v. Phillips, 101 Ga. 691, 31 SE 216, 44 LRA 369.

[c] The representative cannot by any reservation or exception in his deed, whether made in pursuance of an order of court or not, create a new right or interest in the land conveyed. Blankenship v. Whaley, 124 Cal. 300, 57 P 79.

[d] Purchase of interest of partner.—A purchaser at an administrator's sale of a deceased partner's interest in land acquires only the interest of the decedent in the land on a settlement of the partnership affairs, the proceeds of the sale belonging to the estate of the deceased partner. Hartnett v. Stillwell, 121 Ga. 386, 49 SE 276, 104 AmSR 151.

[e] If the representative has individual rights (1) in the land sold, these do not pass to the purchaser title the purchaser takes none,[86] even though the real owner was a party to the proceeding,[87] while if decedent was estopped to claim title, the purchaser is also estopped.[88] The purchaser takes subject to the obligations under which decedent held the property,[89] and easements to which the property was subject.[90] The title cannot be given effect by relation to the date of a lien which was discharged from the proceeds of the sale.[91] No land or interest will pass except that stated in the petition[92] and included in the order,[93] and none except that actually sold.[94] One who buys land for a specific price cannot afterward be heard to contend that what he bought included and carried back to him any portion of the money he expressly agreed to pay.[95] Easements and necessary incidents to the enjoyment of property will pass with it,[96] as (Dickerson v. Campbell, 32 Mo. 544; Gjerstadengen v. Van Duzen, 7 N. D. 612, 76 NW 233, 66 AmSR 679) (2) unless the circumstances are such as to estop the representative (Cooper v. Lindsay, 109 Ala. 338, 19 S 379).

Matson v. Johnson, 48 Wash. 256, 93 P 324, 125 AmSR 924.

[b] Where county records showed that land in controversy was the separate property of a married woman, who predeceased her husband, a purchaser of the land at a sale by the husband's administrator was charged with notice that the land did not belong to the husband's estate, and was not therefore a purchaser in good faith. [a] Discrepancy not a "mistake in description."—The fact that land is sold which is not embraced in the petition to sell, or in the decree of confirmation, is not a "mistake in description" within Code (1906) § 2072 (Annot. Code [1892] § 1897), providing that any mistake in describing land of decedent sold, etc., in any part of the proceedings, may be corrected on petition of the purchaser. Pearson v. Caldwell, 93 Miss. 637, 47 S 436.

[a] Thus, where it was supposed that a decedent held only an equity of redemption, and this only was ordered sold and was sold, and it turned out that decedent had an absolute unencumbered title, nothing passed by the sale. Crane v. Guthrie, 47 Iowa 542.

[b] Construction of order—An administrator, in order to facilitate a compromise agreement between the heirs, applied for an order to sell "all the accounts, notes, choses in action, claims, and judgments now in the hands of the administrator," due and owing by any and all parties, etc. These consisted of a quantity of old accounts and claims supposed to be uncollectable which the administrator sold for fifty dollars. The purchaser had no knowledge that the estate was interested as a beneficiary in a trust fund in question to the extent of about three thousand dollars, which trust at the time of the sale remained unadministered by the trustee, and had not been inventoried. It was held that property "in the hands of" the administrator did not include anything that might be reduced to the administrator's possession thereafter, but meant only property then in his actual possession or in such condition that actual possession was legally with the person described as holding it, and that, there being no intention to include the estate's interest in such fund, it did not pass by the assignment. Routledge v. Elmendorf, 54 Tex. Civ. A. 174, 116 SW 156.

[c] On the other hand (1) where an order merely authorized a sale of patent rights, and with them there were sold certain accrued claims arising therefrom, the confirmation of the sale, as made, was equivalent to a previous order directing it. May v. Logan County, 30 Fed. 250. (2) So also, where an administrator was authorized to sell six hundred and forty acres out of a survey, his sale of a greater quantity would not necessarily be void, but the purchaser became an owner in common with decedent's legal representatives, and as such could hold the entire tract as against third persons. Milwee v. Phelps, 53 Tex. Civ. A. 195, 115 SW 891.

[a] Tract larger than was supposed.—Where a tract supposed to contain one hundred acres was sold at a certain price per acre, the purchaser took only one hundred acres, although it was subsequently ascertained that the tract contained more. Williams v. Bradley, 7 Heisk. (Tenn.) 54.

[b] Contemporaneous interpretation of statute.—The estate sold is to be determined by the interpretation given to the statute creating it at the time of the sale and not by a different interpretation thereafter given it by the courts. Myers v. Boyd, 144 Ind. 496, 43 NE 567.

[c] The deed is to be construed in connection with the will, the decree, and the report of sale. Francisco v. Billingsley, (Tenn. Ch. A.) 48 SW 323.

[d] Conclusiveness of terms of deed or decree.—(1) Where all of a certain tract of land which decedent owned at his death was ordered sold and was sold and the description in the deed by courses and distances did not include all, the purchasers nevertheless took the entire tract sold. McGhee v. Hoyt, 106 Pa. 516. (2) The confirmation of a report passes title to the entire property sold, although the decree vesting title does so only as to part. Killough v. Warren, (Tenn. Ch. A.) 58 SW 898; Williams v. Clark, (Tenn. Ch. A.) 51 SW 130. (3) Where property was put up as of an unknown quantity and was afterward, and before adjudication, described as having a known quantity, the positive description in the deed will control. Macarty v. Foucher, 12 Mart. (La.) 114.

95. Dull v. Slater, 31 Pa. Super. 488 (where land is sold at an orphans' court sale charged with a sum of money, the interest of which was payable to the decedent's mother during her life, and the principal after her death to the heirs of decedent's father, who died intestate, and the purchaser agrees that the charge shall remain as theretofore, the purchaser cannot, after the widow's death, claim that he is not liable to pay any portion of the fund to the heirs at law of the decedent as whose estate the land was sold).

[a] This rule has been applied to: (1) The right to use a dam to its full capacity. Maguire v. Baker, 57 Ga. 109. (2) The right to occupy land for the purpose of finishing the will also fixtures;[97] and it seems that the order of sale of an inchoate title will carry the title so far as it is perfected at the time of the sale.[98] It is also considered that the purchaser takes free of an outstanding equity of which he is not chargeable with notice.[99] Where an executor conveyed estate land to his son with the understanding that the son was later to reconvey to him, and the son did not pay, or agree to pay, anything for the land, but the purchase price was paid by the executor, and the deed because of a misdescription did not convey the legal title, it was held that the son had no equitable interest in the land.[1]

[§ 1697] b. Rule Caveat Emptor. The rule caveat emptor applies to sales of decedent's property under order of court,[2] and after the sale has been confirmed[3] the purchaser has, ordinarily, no right to complain because of defects in quantity,[4] tanning of hides thereon which were sold, together with bark and tools necessary for the process. Palmer v. Petty, 21 La. Ann. 176. (3) The right to the unimpeded flow of an artificial watercourse extending through the land. Brakely v. Sharp, 10 N. J. Eq. 206.

99. Higbee v. Billick, 244 Mo. 411, 427, 148 SW 879 ("It is insisted that the plaintiff, a purchaser at an administrator's sale, bought as if at an execution sale subject to the doctrine of caveat emptor and took subject to all defendant's equities. Contra, it is argued for plaintiff that the sale was a judicial sale and that something is due to that fact as distinguished from an execution sale. Generally, and somewhat loosely speaking, courts have dealt with execution sales as judicial sale; but in strictness there may be a difference, as pointed out by our brother Gantt in Noland v. Barrett, 122 Mo. 181, 189, 26 SW 692, 43 AmSR 572. The sale in hand was clearly a judicial sale stricti juris. It was specifically ordered by the court. It was made pursuant to judicial authority. It was approved by the court prior to the execution of the deed, and, to crown all, the very deed was ordered by the court. But we think it unprofitable to be drawn into an exposition of the law in the above regard; for even in an execution sale the purchaser gets title through his sheriff's deed as against a deed by the execution debtor unrecorded at the time. Vance v. Corrigan, 78 Mo., loc., Cit. 95, 86; Harrison Mach. Works v. Bowers, 200 Mo. 219, 231, 232, 92 SW 185, 98 SW 539. [a] Mistake.—Where the executor and bidder both believed that a building was entirely on the lot sold, and it turned out to be in part on other land, the sale was rescinded as being based on a mutual mistake as to the condition of the property. McKay v. Coleman, 85 Mich. 60, 48 NW 203.

[b] On the other hand (1) it has been held that a purchaser may claim a diminution in the price for deficiency in the quantity (Davenport v. Fortier, 3 Mart. N. S. (La.) 695) and (2) that the fact that a

[§ 1698] c. Warranty[9]—(1) None as against Estate. On a sale of a decedent's property under order of court there is no implied warranty, either of title or quality;[10] and it is generally held that the representative is without authority to make an express warranty which will bind the estate.[11]

purchaser at an execution sale saw the premises does not prevent him from demanding a conveyance of a lot of the full width advertised where decedent owned an adjoining lot, and a simple inspection would not have disclosed a discrepancy in the frontage (Keily v. Saunders, 236 Pa. 593, 85 A 9).

[c] Recovery of excess payment.—Where land ordered sold for payment of debts was sold by a commissioner at a certain price per acre, and the purchaser, under representations by the commissioner that the tract contained a certain number of acres, paid for ninety-six acres more than the tract actually contained, the purchaser was entitled to recover the excess paid from the distributees of the estate. personal covenant of any nature whatsoever on the part of the executor or administrator will be implied.[13]

[§ 1700] d. Protection of Bona Fide Purchasers[14]—(1) In General. A person may be an innocent purchaser at a sale by an executor or administrator and be entitled to protection as such,[15] and a subsequent vendee of the purchaser, who takes in good faith and without notice, may be protected,[16] although the sale could not stand as between the original purchaser and the heirs of decedent.[17] Where under a description said to be susceptible of double construction, a purchaser at a succession sale accepts a certain tract of land as being the land described, and sells the same, his taking possession of another tract as the land described will be held to be in bad faith as to a purchaser who had acquired such other tract by description admitting of but one construction.[18]

[§ 1701] (2) Fraud on Purchaser. The rule that fraud vitiates everything generally prevails as against the rule of caveat emptor to the extent that a sale induced by the fraudulent misrepresentations of the administrator will be set aside,[19] but it is well settled that such misrepresentations do not render the estate liable in damages, but only the administrator individually,[20] and, according to a number of authorities, such misrepresentations cannot be urged as a defense in an action for the price,[21] although other authorities assert the contrary view.[22] The mere silence of the representative as to a known defect of title,[23] or the expression of an opinion as to the effect of facts known to the purchaser,[24] is not a fraud which will vitiate the Club Land, etc., Co., 95 Tex. 200, 66 SW 294 [mod 26 Tex. Civ. A. 449, 64 SW 872]. To same effect Thayer v. Wendell, 23 F. Cas. No. 13,873, 1 Gall. 37. (3) A covenant to warrant to the extent of assets, and if the land should be lost by any prior claim to refund the purchase money with interest, imposes no liability on the executor individually or beyond the assets in his hands at the time of eviction. Manifee v. Morrison, 1 Dana (Ky.) 208. (4) Where an administrator, acting under a void order of court, sold a lot belonging to the estate and covenanted as administrator with the purchaser, "his heirs and legal representatives to warrant and forever defend this title to the aforesaid lot against the claim or claims of any and all persons lawfully claiming or to claim the same or any part thereof to the extent that I am bound to do according to law as such administrator and no further," and the administrator in his individual capacity held a life estate in one sixth of the lot, the life estate passed to the purchaser by the deed of the administrator. [a] Who entitled to protection.—Where, in payment of land bought at an executor's sale by a lien creditor, the latter credited his claim against the estate for the amount due on it, and gave the additional consideration in cash, which was used by the executor to pay off other debts, it constituted the vendee a purchaser for value. [a] The rule applies to a mortgagee of the purchaser. But where the property is sold under foreclosure after the commencement of proceedings to set aside the sale, to which the purchaser and the mortgagee have been made parties, the equity of the purchaser at the foreclosure sale extends only to the amount of the mortgage debt and interest thereon. Hatfield v. Richmond, 161 Ky. 352, 170 SW 951.

[b] Warranty deed.—Where an innocent vendee for value from the purchaser at the sale receives a warranty deed from such purchaser, he is not charged with notice of outstanding equities, unless there was something in his chain of title or in the general situation to put him on inquiry, although the purchaser at the administrator's sale was not a purchaser for value by reason of having credited the amount of his bid on a debt against the estate. Nelson v. Bridge, 39 Tex. Civ. A. 283, 87 SW 885 (where land owned by a nonresident was sold to pay debts in spite of the testator's will, a copy of which was filed and proved in the state, such will was not within the chain of title of a subsequent purchaser, so as to charge him with notice of outstanding equities).

[c] When rule not applicable.—The doctrine that, although a sale may be voidable as against an original purchaser, bona fide purchasers may acquire title which cannot be set aside, is not applicable to an equitable proceeding by original purchasers at an administrator's sale to correct mistake in deed. Broadhurst v. Hill, 137 Ga. 833, 74 SE 422.

[d] Notice.—Where an administrator's deed of land sold to pay debts described the kind of record, the number of the volume, and the page wherein the order of the court was entered, by virtue of which the administrator was authorized to execute the deed in question, as required by statute, and such deed, if examined, would have disclosed that the administrator sold only twelve acres of land, more or less, and a subsequent purchaser afterward discovered that the description therein covered more than three times that amount of land, such purchaser was chargeable with notice thereof, and of the right of the administrator to correct the mistake. sale. A sale will bind the purchaser notwithstanding it was induced by the fraud of a legatee or distributee, the purchaser's remedy being personal against the person guilty of the fraud;[25] and the same is true where misrepresentations are made by a third person without collusion of the administrator.[26] Where a member of a law firm having charge of the settlement of a succession purchases land belonging to a succession at a sale provoked presumably by him or his firm, he is estopped to set up the title so acquired as against an innocent purchaser of the same land, at a subsequent sale similarly provoked.[27]

[§ 1702] (3) Fraud on Others. Although a sale is fraudulent as against the heirs or others interested in the property, the title of a purchaser in good faith and without notice of the fraud will not be affected;[28] nor will that of a subsequent purchaser in good faith from the vendee, although the latter may have been a party to the fraud.[29] A subsequent purchaser with notice will take a good title if the original purchaser was without notice.[30] Even if the sale is set aside the rights of a bona fide purchaser will be protected.[31]

[§ 1703] (4) Defective Proceedings. A bona fide purchaser will be protected against a divestiture of his title by reason of a defect in the proceedings under which he bought,[32] provided the court had jurisdiction,[33] and the order or decree in terms authorized the sale.[34] The purchaser is not bound to go behind the order to ascertain if it was regularly granted,[35] or to investigate as to whether the directions of the law as to the manner of the sale were in all respects complied with,[36] although it has been considered that a purchaser is chargeable with notice of defects which appear in any part of the record of the proceedings in which the sale is had,[37] and a recital in the deed may be sufficient to put the purchaser on notice.[38] A bona fide purchaser's title will not be defeated by a subsequent reversal of the order or decree of sale.[39] A sale by an executor acting under a will duly probated passes title to a bona fide purchaser, although the will is subsequently set aside,[40] and a purchaser from the purchaser at the sale takes good title, although the administration is afterward revoked.[41]

Cooper, 94 Ala. 170, 178, 11 S 325, 33 AmSR 105, 16 LRA 813 ("The purchaser buys at his peril; he takes upon himself the risks of any outstanding rights that could have been asserted against the decedent; and if by reason of the existence of such rights, whether known or not, or discoverable or not, he takes nothing by his purchase, he can not complain. Perkins v. Winter, 7 Ala. 855; Burns v. Hamilton, 33 Ala. 210, 70 AmD 570; Bland v. Bowie, 53 Ala. 152; Fore v. McKenzie, 58 Ala. 115; Lovelace v.

also been held that the purchaser will not be compelled to pay his money and take a title substantially defective unless the sale was made of an estate or interest short of the entire title, and so mentioned in the decree or clearly to be implied from the nature of the sale.[45] Again a distinction has been made that, where a particular piece of land is sold under an order of court, a good title is deemed to be offered and a purchaser will not be compelled to complete his purchase by the payment of the price if it appears that a good title cannot be made;[46] but it is otherwise where the sale is ordered merely of the estate of a person named in the land.[47] A purchaser has been held relieved from his bid on discovery of a defect in title before confirmation,[48] and the sale has been set aside for such defect.[49] In another case the sale was set aside on the ground that the petition stated seizin in fee, when decedent in fact only owned an undivided half.[50] Again, where all parties knew all the facts, and were acting under a mutual mistake of law, and believed that the purchaser would be invested with a good title to the whole of the property sold, when in fact an interest in the property would not pass, the purchaser was held relievable from his bid upon discovery of the mistake.[51]

The fact that decedent's title is not of record has been held sufficient to put the purchaser on inquiry.[52]

[§ 1705] (6) Curative Statutes. In a number of states statutes have been enacted for the protection of the title of purchasers in good faith against defects in the proceedings.[53] These generally cure merely those defects which do not concern jurisdictional steps,[54] and it is usually held that they cannot constitutionally operate to give effect to a sale which is void for want of jurisdiction.[55] But in this respect the rule must be borne in mind that the proceeding is generally held to be one in rem, and that the authority of the legislature is very broad in declaring what shall be necessary to invoke the power of the court; therefor it is said that whatever the legislature need not in the first instance have required it may waive by a curative act.[56] Within these limits statutes may be made retroactive, so as to perfect titles under sales made before their passage.[57]

[§ 1706] e. Estoppel to Dispute Title. A creditor of the estate who accepts payment of his claim out of the proceeds of a sale of real estate to pay debts, with knowledge of the facts, cannot deny the purchaser's title on the ground that the tes-

Webb, 62 Ala. 271. There are some expressions to be found in opinions handed down here, indicative of a doubt in the minds of the writers as to 'whether the rule of caveat emptor, which applies to judicial sales, will go further than to cover those defects which may be disclosed by an examination of the chain of title; or, at least, whether it would cover such secret equities as no ordinary diligence could discover.' Wilson v. Holt, 83 Ala. 539, 3 Am. St. Rep. 768. We do not share in this doubt. To give that limitation to the doctrine of caveat emptor, would be to emasculate it altogether. To hold that the purchaser at an administrator's sale made under an order of the court of probate need only look out for defects disclosed by the proceeding in which the order is entered, and by the muniments of the intestate's chain of title, would be to put such purchaser upon the footing of a vendee from an individual, and to strip the fact that he buys at a judicial sale of all significance whatever; thus destroying the doctrine that he buys at his peril, and takes, not the estate the record and paper muniments indicate the intestate held, as would a vendee at private sale, but the interest only which was so held in point of extraneous fact. We cannot subscribe to the limitation suggested; but, on the contrary, adhere to the broad doctrine announced in the authorities cited, that the purchaser at such sale gets only such right, interest, or estate as resided in the intestate, the apparent title being qualified and limited by every fact or circumstance, whether in pais or of record, which would have constituted an outstanding equity against the decedent in his life-time").

tator before his death had conveyed the land to such creditor.[58]

[§ 1707] f. Effect of Lien for Inheritance Tax. Where the proceeds of real estate sold by an executor are in court, or will be paid into court, and are subject to the order of the court, the title to the real estate is not defective, although the state has a lien thereon to secure it in the amount of an inheritance tax due to it, since the proceeds may be subjected to the payment of such tax.[59]

[§ 1708] g. In General. For some purposes the title is held to pass at the time of the sale,[61] but generally title does not vest until confirmation,[62] and compliance by the purchaser with the terms of the sale;[63] and many authorities hold that the title does not completely vest until a conveyance has been executed under a decree directing it.[64] It is held in some cases that when title does pass it relates back to the date of the sale,[65] or even to the date of decedent's death,[66] but it cannot relate back so as to charge the purchaser with taxes accruing between decedent's death and the sale.[67]

[§ 1710] b. As to Rents and Profits. The purchaser is generally entitled to the rents and profits of the land sold from the time when he became entitled to possession,[68] his right in this respect being ordinarily fixed by the time of confirmation and not by the time of sale.[69] Under statutes, however, the purchaser, after confirmation, is sometimes entitled to rents accruing from the day of sale,[70] and from such a rule it follows that the purchaser cannot be held liable for rents and profits between the time of the sale and the time of confirmation.[71] It is sometimes held that the purchaser takes all payments falling due after confirmation,[72] and sometimes that there should be an apportionment between the heirs and purchaser of rent inuring before and after confirmation.[73] An express reservation from the sale of rents or crops to mature may be enforced,[74] and it has been held that growing crops sold by the heirs of decedent while the proceedings for a sale were pending but before the actual sale do not pass to the purchaser.[75] But there is, on the other hand, authority for the view that on the death of a debtor his debts become a lien on his real estate, and anyone who plants crops thereon after his death does so at the risk of loss by a sale to satisfy such lien.[76]

[§ 1711] 6. Proceedings to Perfect Rights of Purchaser—a. To Obtain Deed. The probate court has sometimes power to compel the representative to make a proper conveyance to the purchaser,[77] and where this power exists equity cannot interfere except when, because of accident, mistake, or similar cause, there can be no relief in the probate court.[78] Where the probate court cannot compel the representative to convey, the remedy of the purchaser is by a suit for specific performance of the contract of sale,[79] but such a suit cannot avail the purchaser to obtain title where the sale itself was defective.[80]

Mandamus has been held a proper remedy to compel the execution of a conveyance.[81]

Damages against estate. In a suit to compel an administrator to make a deed to a purchaser at his sale under order of the court, on an allegation that he refused to do so and intended to make a resale, the estate cannot be charged with damages to the purchaser for the alleged misconduct of the administrator in refusing to make the deed.[82]

[§ 1712] b. To Obtain Possession. Where the sale was made in pursuance of a decree in equity, the court will by writ of assistance place the purchaser in possession, if possession is withheld by parties to the suit,[83] but not where the land is held adversely to the title of the heirs or devisees.[84] One not a party may be dispossessed through a rule against him to show cause.[85] The purchaser may maintain ejectment;[86] but he cannot maintain summary proceedings to dispossess persons found in possession of the premises without showing that the relation of landlord and tenant exists.[87] Where there are several purchasers of different tracts, and a mistake in describing the tracts affecting all, all the purchasers must be parties to an action by one for the purpose of establishing his right to possession of the tract purchased.[88]

[§ 1713] 7. Redemption. There is no right of redemption from a sale of a decedent's land under order of court for payment of his debts.[89]

[§ 1714] U. Conveyance[90]—1. Necessity. It is usual for statutes as to administration sales of the realty of decedents to provide for the execution of a conveyance to the purchasers, when certain conditions have been complied with,[91] and it is very generally considered that the purchaser does not become vested with the complete title until a proper conveyance has been executed.[92] There is, however, authority for the view that title passes when the sale is made and confirmed,[93] and that the deed is merely evidence of the title;[94] and statutory provisions are sometimes such that adjudication properly made and recorded carries a complete title to the purchaser without the necessity for any deed.[95] Even though a deed is necessary to pass the legal title, a purchaser who has complied with the terms of sale, which sale has been confirmed, has an equitable title.[96]

[§ 1715] 2. Authority to Convey—a. In General. When the authority to execute such a conveyance is regulated by statute, as it generally is, the personal representative has no right to execute it, or the purchaser to demand its execution, until the statutory requirements are complied with.[97] It is usually required that, before a deed is executed, the sale shall be confirmed by the court,[98] and the purchase money paid,[99] or the terms of sale complied with,[1] and an order of court directing the execution of the conveyance is sometimes necessary.[2]

[c] The title to land sold on credit under order of the probate court for distribution is not divested out of the heir until a conveyance is executed under order of the court, after ascertaining that the entire purchase money has been paid. The purchaser at such a sale takes but an inchoate equity which on full payment of the purchase money ripens into a perfect equity, entitling him to a conveyance under order of the court or a resort to equity to divest the title of the heirs. Ketchum v. Creagh, 53 Ala. 224.

Louden v. Martindale, 109 Mich. 235, 67 NW 133. (2) In Texas it has been held that since a land certificate is regarded as personalty and the title of personalty vests in the purchaser upon the making of an order confirming an administrator's sale, a written conveyance of such certificate is not necessary, but, it being a fixed custom to make a written conveyance thereof, the title, under the circumstances, would vest in the grantee in the administrator's conveyance. The court is the vendor, not the personal representative, and may in its discretion appoint some other person than the representative to execute the conveyance. . . . It is settled by a long line of decisions in this court that under a sale of lands made in pursuance of an order or decree of the court of probate, the title of the heirs or devisees is not divested until a conveyance is executed by the order of the court. [§ 1716] b. Who Has Authority. The personal representative is generally the person authorized to execute the conveyance,[3] but other persons are sometimes authorized to execute it.[4]

Administrator de bonis non. It is usually considered that if an executor or administrator dies, or his official character is terminated, after he has made a sale, an administrator de bonis non may execute a deed to the purchaser, by virtue of his authority to take up the administration at the point where his predecessor left off,[5] although a contrary view has also been expressed.[6]

Agent of executor or administrator. The execution of the deed is an act which must be performed by the executor or administrator personally, and cannot be delegated to an agent or attorney.[7]

If the administratrix is a married woman it is not necessary that her husband should join with her in the execution of a deed of the real estate of her decedent sold by her under an order of court.[8]

[§ 1717] c. Duration of Authority. As a general rule there is no prescribed period within which such a conveyance must be executed, but it may be executed at any time so long as the order authorizing its execution continues in force.[9] So long as a personal representative has not resigned or been discharged or removed he may execute a valid conveyance, even though he has made his final settlement;[10] and it has been considered that, if this is necessary to protect the rights of the purchaser, the representative may, after the termination of his office, execute a conveyance for land sold, and the purchase money of which was paid, during his administration,[11] although there is also authority for the view that after his resignation, removal, or discharge, his authority ceases and he cannot execute a valid conveyance, even though the land was sold before he ceased to act as personal representative.[12] If before the expiration of his office he executes an imperfect deed he may make the proper corrections in it at any time.[13]

[§ 1718] d. Extent of Authority. Unless it is otherwise provided in the order of sale the representative is authorized to convey only an estate in fee.[14] Necessarily, however, only such title as decedent had can be conveyed,[15] and no title passes to land not described in the order of sale.[16]

[§ 1719] 3. To Whom Conveyance Made. The

resentative did not obtain an order to make title before executing such conveyance, this being a mere irregularity. Wood v. Montgomery, 60 Ala. 500. [a] Presumption against intent to exceed authority.—Where a deed made by an administrator recited the authority given by the ordinary of the county to sell at public outcry the land covered by the deed, "with the exception of all the granite on said lot of land," but in the granting clause failed to make reference to the granite, it will be presumed that the administrator did not undertake to exceed his authority, and that there was no intention to pass title to the granite. conveyance is generally made to the purchaser, and it has been held that, when the decree confirming the sale orders a conveyance to be made to the purchaser, it must be made to the person who really purchased the land at the sale and to him only.[17] But the more generally accepted view is that the conveyance may be made to the assignee of the purchaser,[18] or to such person as the purchaser may indicate.[19] Where the property of a decedent is reported as sold to one "as administrator," a subsequent deed vesting him personally with the title is not in accordance with the master's report of sale, and such purchaser will be held as trustee of the estate.[20]

[§ 1720] 4. Form, Contents, and Execution—a. In General. The conveyance must be adapted to conveying the estate which is the subject matter of the sale made.[21] Authority to sell and convey must appear on the face of the instrument,[22] but it is not necessary to set out the order of sale at length[23] unless this is required by statute,[24] nor is it necessary to recite the reasons on which the order of sale was based.[25] The deed must contain any recitals required by statute,[26] and should state the consideration of the sale,[27] but it is not necessary to state the amount of the nominal bid, where it was agreed between the purchaser and the administrator before the sale that the amount of any encumbrances on the land should be deducted from the amount which the purchaser should bid.[28] It has been held that the conveyance need not recite that the sale was by auction,[29] that the grantee was the highest bidder,[30] or that the sale was confirmed;[31] and even where the statute requires a

"It is an established principle, that the authority, by virtue of which an administrator is empowered to sell and convey estate, must appear on the deed of conveyance, and with such certainty, that the act done, shall visibly be warranted by the power conferred. . . . And although in some cases, it has been held, that the authority need not be referred to, when the act done is of such a nature, that it can have no operation, unless by virtue of the power, . . . yet this principle has never been supposed applicable to the conveyances made by executors and administrators." Lockwood v. Sturdevant, 6 Conn. 373, 386.

[a] A deed of an administrator de bonis non, based on a sale made by the original administrator, is void, where it does not recite a petition for such deed, and where it is based on a report of sale by the administrator de bonis non, and not by the administrator. Jackson v. Johnson, 248 Mo. 680, 154 SW 769.

[b] A mere recital in the deed that an order to sell was granted is not sufficient, although the law does not require that the order or a certified copy of it shall be attached to the deed. Brown v. Madden, 141 Ga. 419, 81 SE 196.

[d] A supplemental order which does not affect the power to sell given by the original order, and does not relate to the substance of the original order, but only modifies it as to the credit to be given, need not be referred to in the administrator's deed. A reference to the original order is sufficient. Moffitt v. Moffitt, 69 Ill. 641. To same effect El Paso v. Ft. Dearborn Nat. Bank, 96 Tex. 496, 74 SW 21 [rev on other grounds (Civ. A.) 71 SW 799]; Odell v. Kennedy, 26 Tex. Civ. A. 439, 64 SW 802.

[e] Amendment.—An administrator will be allowed and compelled in a court of equity to amend a deed made by him on a sale made by order of court, by inserting a recital of such order, as required by statute. Thorp v. McCullum, 6 Ill. 614.

[f] A mistake in the recital of the order of sale will not vitiate the deed if the order was sufficient. Jones v. Taylor, 7 Tex. 240, 56 AmD 48.

[g] Showings held sufficient.—(1) A certified copy of an administrator's deed executed in 1848 recited that the probate court had ordered the administrators to sell land sufficient to liquidate the debts of the estate; that certain named appraisers had been appointed and had appraised the property to be of the value of $—— per acre, amounting to $——, that the administrator, after due notice, offered the lands at public sale; and that the grantee bid for such land in a certain sum, etc. The deed and probate records were destroyed by fire. In trespass to try title to the property, the son of the decedent testified that his father died about 1845; that the estate was administered by the administrators named, and was closed prior to 1849; that the league from which the land was sold for the purpose of paying community debts was community property; and that the grantee was the purchaser of some of it. It was held that the authority of the administrator to sell the land was conclusively shown. Williams v. Cessna, 43 Tex. Civ. A. 315, 95 SW 1106. (2) The recital of authority is sufficient where it is in the following form: "I, Anne Bliss, of East-Windsor, executrix of the last will and testament of Ebenezer Bliss, of said East-Windsor, for and in consideration . . . do, by these presents, and in conformity to an order of the honorable court of probate of the district of Hartford, dated the 24th day of March, 1786, me thereto directing and empowering, give, grant, bargain," etc. Watson v. Watson, 10 Conn. 77.

[h] Showing held insufficient.—A recital in an administrator's deed that at the ——— term of court an order and decree to sell land had been made, followed by a recital that the grantor was appointed administrator of the estate of L on Dec. 19, 1840, which was the date of the issuance of letters of temporary administration, is insufficient to raise a presumption that an order had been granted to the grantor as permanent administrator authorizing him to sell land. recital of confirmation, the omission of such recital does not render the deed a nullity but merely deprives it of its character as prima facie evidence of the regularity of the proceedings.[32] It is not essential that the deed be signed as executor, administrator, or commissioner, provided the capacity in which the grantor conveys appears in any other part of the instrument.[33]

Mere informalities or technical defects will not ordinarily invalidate the deed.[34] Thus the conveyance is not invalidated by a mistake in the technical designation of the grantor, as where an administrator is described as executor[35] or vice versa,[36] because the grantor, who should sign as commissioner, signs as administrator,[37] or because of the lack of a seal.[38] Neither is the validity of the deed affected by a mistake therein as to the date of the sale,[39] or a misrecital as to the purposes of the sale[40] or as to the date of the license to sell if it contains a recital of other facts which show that the sale was made under the true license.[41] So also a deed may be valid, although it uses the words "probate judge" instead of "probate court,"[42] and an erroneous recital as to the time and place of the sale may be disregarded, where the law does not require those facts to be stated in the deed.[43] Where the county in which the administration was pending was divided, and the court which ordered and confirmed the sale improperly transferred the proceeding to the new county, and the court of that county made the deed, it is nevertheless valid as against the heirs of the decedent, although the court of the new county had no jurisdiction.[44]

There is a presumption in favor of the validity and correctness of the deed, especially after the lapse of a considerable time.[45]

[§ 1721] b. Description of Property. The property sold must be so described that it may be certainly identified and its boundaries ascertained,[46] as otherwise the conveyance will be void

[f] Clerical error.—The figures "2,031" in the order of confirmation of sale and the administrator's deed will be considered a clerical error, where the application and order for sale were for two thousand and eighty-one acres. Waterhouse v. Gallup, (Tex. Civ. A.) 178 SW 773.

[g] Correction of errors in description.—(1) Where a purchaser of land at an administrator's sale pays the purchase money, and it is applied in the discharge of the debts of the decedent, but the land is not correctly described in the deed executed by the administrator, an assignee of the purchaser will be entitled to a decree in equity correcting the error and divesting the legal title to the land out of the heirs of the decedent and vesting it in him. Grayson v. Weddle, 80 Mo. 39, 63 Mo. 523. (2) Where petitioner in good faith purchased a lot at an administrator's sale under order of court, believing that she was purchasing the whole of the lot, and the auctioneer conducting the sale publicly announced that there was an error in the advertisement of the sale, but that the administrator was selling, and the purchaser would get a deed to the whole lot, and the sale was confirmed, and the administrator executed a deed, describing, however, only a part of the lot, and petitioner was thereafter put in possession of the whole lot, but subsequently discovered the mistake in the description, petitioner was entitled to have the proceedings corrected, so as to conform to the proper description, and to have the administrator ad litem execute a new deed conveying the lot according to the corrected description. Gomez v. Gomez, 155 Ala. 158, 45 S 637. (3) A statute providing that if any mistake shall be made in the description of land, either in the petition, decree, or other part of the proceedings, the same may be corrected by the court on the petition of the purchaser or his assigns, does not warrant relief where land is sold which is not embraced in the petition for the sale, or in the decree of confirmation, where the claim or relief is based upon the mere idea of the administrator and his attorneys that such land was embraced in a particular lot which was the property of the decedent and was in fact sold. "We think that a correctible mistake under the statute must be pointed to in some way in the petition or decree, and cannot be for uncertainty.[47] The description of the property in the conveyance should follow that which appears in the petition by which a sale is asked and the order by which it is authorized or directed.[48] The deed may properly refer to other accessible documents or records for more specific description or identification.[49]

[§ 1722] 5. Presumption as to Execution and Delivery. Where an administrator petitioned for the sale of real estate to pay debts, and an order of sale was duly made, and a sale was regularly and formally had and reported to and approved by the court, and the administrator in the report of sale and in the final settlement acknowledged the receipt of the purchase price, the presumption will be indulged that the administrator performed his duty and made a deed and delivered it to the purchaser.[50]

[§ 1723] 6. Approval. The statutes sometimes require approval of the deed by the court.[51] Approval indorsed on a deed executed pursuant to a special statute is sufficient where it refers to the statute.[52]

[§ 1724] 7. Acknowledgment. The conveyance must be acknowledged in the manner prescribed by statute in order to pass a complete title,[53] but it has been held that a deed which is not properly acknowledged is sufficient to vest an equitable title in the grantee which will constitute a good defense to an action of ejectment by the heirs of decedent.[54] An acknowledgment may be valid notwithstanding a misrecital therein,[55] and defective acknowledgments may be cured by statute.[56]

[§ 1725] 8. Recording. The conveyance should be recorded;[57] but failure to record the deed does not affect the title as between the purchaser and the estate[58] or the heirs of decedent,[59] nor does the failure of a purchaser at an administrator's sale to record his deed within twelve months from its date postpone his rights to those of a judgment creditor who obtains judgment before record.[60]

[§ 1726] 9. Construction,[61] Operation, and Effect—a. In General. Where an administrator's deed recited the authority given by the ordinary to sell the land covered by the deed, with the exception of the granite on such lot, but in the granting clause failed to refer to the granite, it will be presumed that there was no intent to pass title to the granite.[62] Where an executor sells and conveys by deed timber on a tract of land, and the grantees cut the timber, and thereafter the executor conveys the same land to another person without reserving the timber, but reciting that the testator had sold the land in his lifetime by a verbal agreement to another person who had sold it to the grantee in the second deed, neither the omission to reserve the timber in the second deed nor the recital therein will give the second grantee title to the timber as against the first grantee of the executor.[63] An administrator's deed of a certain number of acres in a survey in which the estate owns several tracts, embracing more, does not convey all the estate owns therein, because the administrator thought it owned no more than was sold.[64] A conveyance made by an executor under order of court cannot be construed to be his act as executor, where on its face it appears as his individual conveyance.[65] Where a sale is illegal the representative's deed executed pursuant thereto is not sufficient to pass title.[66]

[a] Description in petition and order controls.—Where an administrator's deed refers to the petition and order of sale and also contains a description of the land, which varies from that contained in the petition and order, the former description will yield to the latter as against the heirs of decedent. Agan v. Shannon, 103 Mo. 661, 15 SW 757.

[b] Variance in descriptions.—In proceedings to sell land of a decedent, the description of the land in the petition and administrator's deed gave the field notes, but the order of sale did not. The petition described the land as being covered by patent No. 249, which was the proper number, but the order of sale and administrator's deed described it as No. 248. The field notes showed that the property was the same as that covered by patent No. 249. It was error, in trespass to try title, to exclude the deed and order because of the variance, it being for the court to determine whether the land in controversy was that intended to be sold. Minor v. Lumpkin, (Tex. Civ. A.) 29 SW 800.

[c] Presumption in case of variance.—It will be presumed that the administrator committed a clerical error in inserting a wrong description of land in his report of sale and deed, where the description differs from that contained in the order of sale. Agan v. Shannon, 103 Mo. 661, 15 SW 757.

conveyance,[67] whether of warranty[68] or quiet enjoyment.[69] It has been considered that the executor or administrator will be held to respond personally to the full scope of such a covenant, although he describes himself as executor or administrator,[70] but there is also authority for the view that a covenant in the deed which refers to the representative capacity of the grantor is not binding upon him personally.[71]

[§ 1728] c. Conveyance as Evidence. A personal representative's conveyance of his decedent's land made without authority is a nullity and no evidence of title in the grantee.[72] To support his title under a deed from the representative it is necessary for the grantee to show that the grantor had a valid power to sell and that such power was exercised in the manner required by law,[73] and, in the absence of statute, proof of authority other than a recital thereof in the conveyance is necessary.[74] A fortiori an administrator's deed, not reciting that there was any public sale, or that it was made in accordance with the order of the ordinary, should not be admitted in evidence as a muniment of title, without the aid of other evidence to show that the land was in fact sold at public sale.[75] Due authority having, however, been shown, the recitals in the conveyance of the acts required by law to be done in making the sale will be considered as prima facie evidence of their having been done as therein recited.[76] Under some statutes recitals in such a conveyance are themselves evidence of the facts recited,[77] and constitute prima facie evidence of title.[78] An administrator's deed, however, is only presumptive evidence of the regularity of the proceedings prior to the sale.[79] It is sometimes made necessary, in order that an administrator's deed be admissible as a muniment of title, that it should be accompanied by the order of sale,[80] but the deed, accompanied by the order, is admissible as a muniment of title without production of the letters of administration.[81] A deed of conveyance executed by commissioners under an order of the orphans' court to the purchaser at their sale is admissible as evidence of the conveyance.[82] A conveyance by

[§ 1729] 10. Mortgage. A mortgage given by the personal representative should in its provisions accord with the order or license under which it is executed,[84] and should not contain unauthorized provisions.[85] Such a mortgage is not void because of mere irregularities.[86] A reference to the order of the court and a recital of the execution of the mortgage pursuant to such order, with other similar recitals, is sufficient to show that the mortgage was executed by the mortgagor as personal representative in pursuance of law and the court's order, and not in a personal capacity.[87]

(4) When a debt of a decedent is a lien on his real estate and not barred by the statute of limitations at the confirmation of the sale thereof by order of the court for the payment of debts, the lien of the debt is turned upon the fund, and the creditor's right to participate is not affected by a subsequent delay in distribution. Arndt's App., 117 Pa. 120, 11 A 633 [dist Crosson's Est., 6 Pa. Co. 14, 22 WklyNC 226]; Sheridan's Est., 10 Kulp (Pa.) 225.

[i] Improper application.—Where an executor voluntarily and without authority applied a part of the proceeds derived from the sale of testator's realty on a judgment obtained against one legatee, his account should be surcharged with the amount so paid. Matter of Van de Walker, 79 Misc. 661, 141 NYS 325.

[j] Rule affected by agreement.—Where a will provided that after the payment of debts there should be set apart from the estate four thousand dollars, to pay the income to the testator's widow for life, and, there being an insufficiency of personal estate to set apart such sum without a sale of real estate, the widow, who was one of the executors, agreed with the other that three thousand dollars of the personal estate should remain in the executor's note, and that he was to pay her the income on one thousand dollars' worth of the real estate, which should remain invested therein, in order to prevent a present sale of the real estate, the executors were not entitled to pay to the widow an amount out of the principal of the avails of the subsequent sale of the real estate, in order to make up the full income of four thousand dollars to which she was entitled, but which she had not received. can only pay out the proceeds ratably among all the creditors, and if he pays one creditor more than his share, such creditor holds the excess in trust for other creditors.[92] An order of sale of realty is not without jurisdiction because the proceeds were used to pay a mortgage debt upon the property, which had not been probated, where there were other debts which had been duly probated.[93] Where land is sold to pay a fraudulent claim, the proceeds belong to the heirs.[94] Where an administrator procured an order to sell without actual notice given to the widow, and the land was sold for less than the amount necessary to cover the widow's allowance for a year's support, and there was no other property out of which such support could be paid, the widow was entitled to recover the amount for which the land was sold from the administrator.[95]

Payment of administration costs and other charges.[96] The expenses of administration may, according to some authorities, be paid out of the proceeds of realty sold for the payment of debts;[97] but there is also authority for the contrary view.[98] The costs of judgment on a debt due by decedent may be paid out of such proceeds.[99] Where proceedings had been instituted in another court to determine the inheritance tax, the probate court could not acquire, in proceedings to sell real estate, jurisdiction to decree the payment of such tax out of the proceeds of the sale of certain tracts.[1]

Where land not sold to pay debts. Where land is not sold for the payment of debts but for partition, the proceeds thereof are not assets for the payment of debts,[2] without an order making them applicable for that purpose.[3]

Surplus on foreclosure. Where real estate of a decedent was sold under a judgment of foreclosure more than three years after grant of letters to his executrix, the property was not liable for the payment of decedent's debts, under a statute providing for the sale of realty to pay debts within three years, and the surplus money could be distributed in the usual manner without being paid into the surrogate's court.[4]

Special provision for the disposition of proceeds of a sale is sometimes made by statute.[5]

[§ 1731] 2. Satisfaction of Mortgages and Other Liens.[6] Where mortgages or other liens are divested by the sale, the proceeds of such sale should be first applied to the satisfaction of such liens in the order of their priority and the residue to the payment of the other debts of decedent in due course of administration,[7] but an administrator who satisfies a mortgage debt on the land out of the proceeds of a sale thereof had under order of court, without taking an assignment of the mortgage as a condition to payment thereof, is not entitled to credit for such payment.[8] Liens which are not divested by a sale are not to be satisfied out of the proceeds,[9] and so where the administrator of a chattel mortgagor, under order of court, sold the interest of the mortgagor, the mortgagee was not entitled to maintain a bill praying that the money is decreed to be held in trust for the payment of complainant's debt,[10] the purchaser, if affected by notice, having taken the property subject to the rights of the mortgagee, and, even in case the property had been destroyed, the remedy being an action at law.[11] Where, pending administration, the administrator, by authority of the court, executed a mortgage and credited the estate with the amount thereof, and one tract was thereafter sold to a third person, and the other set aside as a probate homestead for the minor children, and the mortgagee demanded the payment of a certain portion of the mortgage debt before releasing the tract sold, which sum the administrator paid, he was held to be entitled to a credit for such payment, although it was a greater sum than such tract was liable for in proportion to its value.[12] Where in a foreclosure suit, for the protection of a third person, a part of the land was ordered first sold, and thereafter the judgment debtor gave a mortgage for an unsecured indebtedness and the amount of the judgment, which the mortgagee paid, taking a transfer thereof, and after the debtor's death the mortgagee had the property sold by the administrator for more than the amount of the judgment, it was held that equity would apply the proceeds in the manner decreed in the foreclosure, and hence the part of the land to be sold last was free from any lien.[13]

charge or debt of any kind whatever is paid.[15]

[§ 1733] 4. Disposition of Surplus. Where a sale for the payment of debts results in a surplus over the amount required for this purpose, such surplus proceeds are distributed as real estate,[16] and the persons beneficially entitled to the personal estate have no rights therein.[17] Such proceeds are subject to the widow's dower right,[18] but the surplus cannot be applied to the payment of a judgment against the personal representative in favor of the widow for an unpaid balance of her year's allowance.[19]

A debt due the estate from the heir may be retained out of his distributive share of the surplus proceeds of real estate sold to pay debts.[20]

Payment of lien against portion of heir. If, at the time of the sale, there are liens by mortgage, judgment, or decree, against the portions of any of the heirs, it is equitable that on a claim filed such liens should be admitted as a valid charge against the shares of the heirs in the surplus.[21]

Procedure to recover surplus from representative. While money acquired by the personal representative from the sale of lands, for the payment of debts, and remaining in his hands for distribution after paying the debts, will be treated as having the qualities of land for certain purposes of administration and succession, for all other purposes it is only money in the hands of the administrator,[22] and any process or procedure to get it out of his hands must necessarily be that which is adapted to the recovery of money as money.[23]

Land fraudulently conveyed by decedent. If an administrator sells land by license of court to pay debts of his intestate, after recovering it from one to whom the intestate conveyed it in fraud of his creditors but for a valuable consideration, a surplus of the proceeds, remaining after paying the debts, belongs to the fraudulent grantee as against the heirs of the intestate.[24]

Where decedent had a life estate in the land, with remainder to another, subject to payment of the life tenant's debts and funeral expenses, the surplus proceeds of sale belong to the remainderman.[25]

[§ 1734] 5. By Whom Proceeds Received and Distributed. It is sometimes provided by statute that the proceeds of a sale shall be received by the personal representative and applied like other as-

Dist. 73, 28 Pa. Co. 125, 19 Montg. Co. 134 ("The fee demanded by the counsel who appeared for the estate was not objected to at the audit, and in default of any testimony as to the character or value of the services, we are unable to say that it was excessive. Against the fund, however, which comprised the proceeds of sale of decedent's real estate, a claim for fees by another counsel was presented, founded upon services rendered in attempting to open and set aside the judgment of the lien creditor in the Common Pleas. The effort was fruitless, and the plaintiff obtained judgment in a sum which the fund for distribution is inadequate to pay. The claim comes before us as a simple debt due by the estate, and not as an allowance to the accountant, who would probably find it difficult to show why two counsel were employed in the matter. Such a debt even if established, would not be a lien upon the fund"). Contra Miller v. Swan, 10 KyL 1015; Markey's Succ., 22 La. Ann. 265. (2) Counsel fees are not entitled to priority over a valid mortgage lien covering the premises sold. Day v. Davis, 47 SW 769, 20 KyL 869.

[e] Time when allowance made.—An allowance for the expenses of a sale of real estate cannot be made until the sale has been had and the fund for their payment secured. Jennings's Est., 10 Pa. Dist. 90.

[f] Retention of proceeds until costs adjusted.—Where an executrix sued to marshal assets and prove claims, in which the court directed a master to sell lands and pay the proceeds, less expenses of sale to the executrix, and she claimed that the master had retained a greater sum than was allowable under the order, an application for an order requiring the master to pay the balance to the executrix was properly continued until the costs were adjusted. [a] The probate court has no jurisdiction of a contest between the administrator of a deceased wife, to whom land had been conveyed for life with remainder to the husband subject to her debts, and the husband, as to the ownership of the surplus of the proceeds on a sale of the land to pay the wife's debts remaining after discharging them. sets,[26] while other statutes provide that they shall be paid into court.[27] Where a trustee appointed to sell real estate on a creditor's bill for a settlement of the estate died after the sale and before the purchase money had been paid, it was held that it was proper to direct the purchaser to pay the purchase money to the creditors entitled to it under the bill.[28] Such proceeds are usually distributed by the court or under its order.[29]

[§ 1735] 6. Duty of Purchaser as to Application of Proceeds. Where land of a decedent is sold or mortgaged under an order of court, the purchaser or mortgagee is under no duty to see to the application of the proceeds, and his rights are not affected by a misapplication thereof.[30] But one to whom property has been mortgaged under order of court must show that the estate, by the administrator, was actually the recipient of the money in order to ask that the estate be estopped to plead illegality of the mortgage.[31]

[§ 1736] W. Liability of Representative[32]—1. In General. Any liability of an executor or administrator on account of sales made by him must arise either from receipt of the purchase money, a failure to execute his duties in the manner required by law, or negligence or misconduct in their performance. There is no liability beyond this, although the representative may have erred in judgment.[33] Where, however, an executors' sale of personal property, through a breach of trust by one of the executors, results in a loss to the estate, the liability of such executors for such loss is not discharged by the mere fact that such sale was reported to the court and by it approved.[34] Where an administrator sells at judicial sale land to which his intestate had no title, and the purchaser is ignorant as to the title, an action will lie against the administrator in his individual capacity for the amount paid and the administrator cannot escape liability by virtue of the doctrine of caveat emptor.[35]

[§ 1737] 2. For Purchase Money—a. In General. The executor or administrator exercising good faith is responsible in general for moneys actually received by him as proceeds of the sale, and for no more,[36] and so, where the proceeds of sale have been paid to the heirs by order of court, the

[c] Order not warranting distribution.—An order directing an executor to sell lands as directed by the will, and that the remainder is distributed after payment of costs and solicitor's fee, in accordance with the interests of defendants as shown in the executor's petition for the sale, is an interlocutory order, and does not warrant distribution of the proceeds of the sale. Beeks v. Rye, 77 Miss. 358, 27 S 635.

[d] Finality of decree.—Where, during the administration of an estate which was indebted to judgment creditors, the court directed a sale of property subject to homestead, and required that the receiver invest the fund for the benefit of the infants during their minority, and that on the termination of the homestead estate the principal should be applied to the judgment, after which the decree was removed from the docket, with leave to reinstate it at any time within three years, the decree was not final, and the principal sum having been deposited in a bank, and remaining until the termination of the homestead without ever having been applied to the judgment, its subsequent disposition was subject to further order of the court. Penn v. Tucker, 114 Va. 669, 77 SE 473.

[e] Appealability of order of court.—A decree of the court of common pleas which does not distribute the whole fund raised upon the sale of real estate is not final; and in case a creditor is not satisfied with the partial appropriation of the fund, he must wait until a decree is made distributing the entire fund, when he may appeal, and have redress for any error committed in such partial appropriation. [d] Receipt by coexecutor. — Where one of two executors obtained the order and sold, he was held liable for the proceeds, although his representative is not liable.[37] But a representative who reports a sale for cash is bound by his report, and cannot escape liability by proving that the sale was on credit.[38] A commissioner to sell, who deposited the purchase money in a solvent bank, has been held not liable when the bank became insolvent at the close of the Civil War.[39] The representative is liable in his representative capacity only for what he receives in that capacity,[40] and the proceeds of a void sale do not become assets with which the representative is chargeable in his representative capacity,[41] although he is chargeable with rents and profits for the time during which the purchaser retains the land.[42] The representative is of course liable for an improper disbursement of the proceeds,[43] and may be charged with interest because of failure to distribute the proceeds at the proper time.[44] Until there has been an accounting in the probate court the right of action for the proceeds is in the administrator de bonis non and not in the heirs.[45]

An action by heirs for the proceeds is personal and not in the nature of a revendication.[46]

[§ 1738] b. Failure to Collect. The personal representative making the sale is liable for any loss resulting from a failure to realize the purchase price, if he has disregarded the requirements of law or of the order of sale, as by extending credit without authority[47] or, where authorized to sell on credit, if he has omitted to take security as required by law or the order of sale;[48] and he is also chargeable with the depreciation of currency received without authority.[49] Independent of express directions, it is negligence charging the representative for any resulting loss if he extends credit without requiring security by mortgage or by some means other than the personal obligation of the purchaser.[50] The representative may also render himself liable by negligence in not proceeding to collect the purchase money.[51] But he is not liable for the deficiency or failure of securities taken by him if they were taken in good faith and without negligence.[52]

[§ 1739] 3. For Negligence or Misconduct in Selling. The representative will be chargeable with a loss which results from his failure in any substantial respect to follow the requirements of the law as to the manner of making the sale[53] or his [§ 1740] 4. For Purchasing at His Own Sale. An executor or administrator who purchases the property at a sale under order of the court is, unless the heirs or devisees recover the land itself,[59] as they are entitled to do in case they elect to have the sale set aside,[60] chargeable with the full value of the land[61] at the time of the sale,[62] or perhaps at the time of the suit.[63] If he has resold he is chargeable with all the profits realized on the resale.[64] It must, however, be shown in order to so charge the representative that he was interested at the time of the sale.[65] As to such interest the report of the representative showing himself to be the purchaser is conclusive against him,[66] but the record is not conclusive in his favor.[67] Where personal property of an estate is sold at a private sale pursuant to an order of the court, and is purchased by a person with a fund in which one of [§ 1741] 5. Estoppel. Persons interested in the land or proceeds may be estopped from asserting a liability against the representative where they agreed that the sale should be made in the manner in which he proceeded.[69]

XIII. INSOLVENT ESTATES

[§ 1742] A. In General. The executor or administrator of an insolvent estate represents the general creditors and holds the property of the estate in trust for them.[70] It is his duty to represent the estate as insolvent and to invoke the action of the probate court accordingly, that the assets may be administered for the general benefit of creditors,[71] and where the estate is actually insolvent, he cannot take it out of the insolvent course of administration by his mere agreement.[72]

[§ 1743] B. What Law Governs.[73] The administration of an insolvent estate is governed by the law of the place where the estate is situated.[74] But this rule does not deprive a citizen of another state of a right to bring his suit against the administrator in the federal court.[75]

[§ 1744] C. Insolvency Proceedings—1. Jurisdiction—a. Probate Court. Ordinarily the administration and settlement of an estate declared insolvent should be carried out and concluded in the probate court.[76] The power of that court in such cases is governed wholly by statute,[77] but is usually sufficiently large to enable it to adjudicate on all matters in reference to the insolvency; and therefore proceedings in the probate court by the administrator will not be enjoined unless it is clear that the facts relied on for the injunction cannot be adjudicated in that court.[78] The probate jurisdiction attaches upon receiving the representatives' report or representation of insolvency, and thenceforward the executor or administrator is considered the actor and is held to notice of subsequent proceedings.[79]

[§ 1745] b. Courts of Equity. A court of equity may have jurisdiction where there are conflicting interests or some question of special equitable cognizance is involved.[80] A statute providing that the county courts shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the chancery and circuit courts to sell real estate of decedents, and that the mode of procedure in the county courts shall conform to the regulations for the conduct of similar cases in the chancery and circuit courts, has been held not to repeal by implication the special system of legislation contained in the code for the administration of insolvent estates, and not to interfere with the jurisdiction of the subject as distributed between the chancery and the county courts.[81]

[§ 1746] 2. Grounds for Declaration of Insolvency. It has been held that a declaration of insolvency should be based on the insufficiency of the personal estate to pay the debts,[82] but it has also been asserted that the insolvency should be estimated upon the value of the whole estate both real and personal.[83] The executor or administrator should not represent the estate insolvent unless he has good reason to believe it so;[84] nor ought the probate judge to allow such a representation and proceed with the estate as insolvent, unless he also on examination has good reason to believe it to be so.[85] The assets need not have been reduced to money but it is sufficient that the representative, from a fair estimate of their value, believes the estate to be insolvent,[86] and an estate is prima facie insolvent where evidences of debt filed against it exceed in amount its available assets, although some of the claims are disputed.[87] Where an estate solvent in fact is declared and administered as insolvent, the proceedings, if not fraudulent, are nevertheless valid and binding, and there is no remedy against the executor or administrator personally.[88]

[§ 1747] 3. Representation of Insolvency—a. In General. The representation of insolvency should show to the court that the estate appears to the executor or administrator to be insolvent,[89] should be in the name of all the executors or administrators, where there are more than one,[90] although it may be sufficient when signed and verified by one alone,[91] and should be filed in the office or court prescribed by statute.[92] It is immaterial whether the representation is made by the original executor or administrator or by his successor in trust.[93]

[§ 1748] b. Time of Making. The estate should be represented insolvent within the time prescribed by statute, if any there be.[94] In the absence of statute there is no particular limitation of time;[95] but the representative is on the one hand entitled to a reasonable time in which to determine whether or not the estate is insolvent,[96] while on the other hand he must make his representation of insolvency within a reasonable time.[97] When a litigated claim against the estate is about to result in judgment for the creditor, and there is doubt as to the solvency of the estate, the proper time for representation of insolvency is before judgment.[98]

[§ 1749] 4. Notice. Under some statutes creditors are the only persons to whom notice of the proceedings for a decree of insolvency is required.[99]

[§ 1750] 5. Right to Oppose Representation. Next of kin who are entitled to the estate if claims against it are barred may question and oppose the representative's application to have the estate declared insolvent.[1] Persons who do not claim as creditors, but merely seek to enforce a trust in their favor against decedent, cannot move for an injunction to restrain proceedings by the executor to have the estate declared insolvent, where the statute entitles "creditors" only to such relief.[2]

[§ 1751] 6. Hearing and Determination. In determining insolvency all valid claims presented against the estate should be considered,[3] and also the assets or resources of the estate,[4] and the representative's prudence or conduct in administering.[5] The court has power to adjudicate on all questions raised in reference to the insolvency,[6] but it is not proper to adjudicate finally upon the correctness or validity of claims or payments that may be incidentally involved;[7] nor should the same strictness and fullness of proof as to their validity be required as when they are up for final adjudication on their merits in an appropriate proceeding for that purpose.[8]

[§ 1752] 7. Decree. A decree of insolvency merely ascertains, as between the personal representative and the creditors, the existing status of the estate, and is binding on both the executor or administrator and the creditors,[9] and not subject to collateral attack,[10] except for fraud[11] or want of jurisdiction;[12] or unless the attacking creditor's right of action did not accrue until after final settlement.[13] A failure to make the surety of the administratrix a party to a proceeding by her for an accounting authorizes the surrogate in his discretion to entertain the application of the surety to open and amend the decree adjudging the insolvency of the estate and determining the percentage which it is able to pay on its indebtedness, which proceeding is an independent one, and not a mere step in the accounting.[14]

Review. An appeal from a decree of a probate judge decreeing or refusing to decree insolvency should be taken within the time prescribed by statute,[15] and upon objections urged in the lower court.[16] The appellate court may order the cause to be remitted with directions for a further hearing.[17] A mere inaccurate instruction constitutes no ground for reversal, when the inaccuracy is not such as would unduly influence the jury.[18]

[§ 1754] D. Estoppel to Assert Insolvency. An executor or administrator who makes no attempt to declare the estate insolvent within the statutory period is estopped subsequently to assert its insolvency in proceedings by a creditor under a statute making the representative liable to creditors, where he neglects or refuses to raise money out of the estate or to pay over what he has in his hands to the creditors.[19]

[§ 1755] E. Effect of Representation or Declaration of Insolvency—1. In General. The effect of filing and advertising a report or representation of insolvency is to preclude the bringing of any suit against the executor or administrator upon claims due from the estate, to preclude any creditor from thereafter acquiring or perfecting a lien, and to require all persons to present their claims in the insolvency proceedings.[20] But until the executor or administrator has taken such steps common-law courts have no notice of the insolvency, and executions against the estate cannot be restrained.[21] The institution of insolvency proceedings does not suspend in favor of creditors the special statute of limitations with reference to actions against executors or administrators nor relieve them from their obligation to commence proceedings either at law or before commissioners within the time limited,[22] nor does it prolong the representative's right to resort to the real estate for the payment of debts.[23] The effect of a decree adjudging the estate to be insolvent is to transfer to the probate court the jurisdiction of all claims against the estate, so that the administration may proceed in conformity with the insolvent legislation.[24] The property passes into the custody of the law for administration on the basis of insolvency, notwithstanding prior and premature dispositions of such property, unless the proceeds of such transactions may serve fairly as a substitute,[25] and notwithstanding a prior attachment of the property.[26] But an order directing that the further administration of an estate should be conducted in the manner provided for the administration of insolvent estates is not retroactive, so as to render the administrator's previous unauthorized management of the intestate's real estate an administrative act for which he is bound to account to the probate court.[27] In the absence of statute the decree of insolvency does not affect the rights of heirs, next of kin, legatees, or devisees, nor is it evidence against them of any fact ascertained by it,[28] nor is its validity affected by their not being made parties to the proceedings.[29] Neither does a decree of insolvency in the orphans' court apply to trust funds held by decedent at his death, so as to deprive the cestui que trust of his property therein.[30] An adjudication of insolvency does not ipso facto terminate the authority of an executor or administrator who has previously qualified,[31] but where the creditors have elected an administrator, the effect is to revoke any former grant of letters on the estate.[32]

[§ 1756] 2. On Pending Actions. In some jurisdictions the declaration of insolvency abates or discontinues all suits against the executor or administrator for the collection of claims against the estate, the creditors being remitted to proof of their claims before the judge or commissioners in

One defendant, alleged to have a claim to cotton as a buyer, demurred to the petition. Before determination of the demurrer the administrator was ordered to sell the mules. Later the demurrer was sustained and demurrant dismissed from the case after which a decree was taken between parties remaining in the litigation. Afterward, but before distribution of the fund from the sale under the decree, the administrator brought suit to marshal the assets of the estate, alleged to be insolvent, making creditors of decedent parties, including those claiming under the former decree, and the party who had been dismissed from the former suit, and asked for an injunction. It was held that an interlocutory order, granting an injunction as to other funds but excepting from the injunction the complainants in the former proceedings, and directing the fund from the sale to be paid to them in accordance with the former decree, was erroneous. insolvency.[33] But in other jurisdictions a pending suit may proceed to judgment so as to ascertain the amount due,[34] or in order better to preserve the litigant's rights in case the estate does not prove eventually insolvent[35] or the insolvency proceedings become defeated by the fault of the executor or administrator himself,[36] or the claim in question is disallowed by the commissioners;[37] and the same is true where the action is not one merely against the estate.[38]

Attachments may be dissolved by the institution of insolvency proceedings.[39]

[§ 1757] 3. On Judgments and Executions. Where judgment was obtained before the representation of insolvency, its status, as establishing a valid claim against the estate, is not affected by the subsequent adjudication of insolvency,[40] and where a judgment was obtained and execution issued thereon before decedent's death, a report of insolvency does not cut off the lien of the judgment creditor.[41] If before or at the time of entry of a judgment against the estate, the personal representative declares the estate to be insolvent, the judgment can be allowed only as a pro rata claim against the estate, and no execution can issue thereon,[42] nor can a suit on the judgment be maintained against the personal representative.[43] Even where execution has issued, a declaration of insolvency will destroy the lien of the judgment and cause the execution to be set aside,[44] but where there has been an actual levy under an execution against the representative, a subsequent representation and adjudication of insolvency does not, it has been held, defeat the lien of the execution on the property levied on.[45]

[§ 1758] 4. On Prior Payment of Claims.[46] An executor or administrator who without authority, although in good faith, distributes or pays out moneys of the estate voluntarily in the belief that it is solvent must generally bear the consequences of his mistake if it afterward proves insolvent,[47] although in his final accounting he may be allowed so much as would have been received under the insolvency proceedings by the person to whom the payment was made.[48] Neither can he recover back any part of the sums so paid,[49] except by virtue of some statutory provision,[50] or under an agreement to refund.[51] The amount previously paid by the executor or administrator to a creditor toward his pro rata dividend upon a debt actually due from decedent should be allowed upon the final settlement of the accounts, although such creditor neglects to come in and prove his debt and claim a dividend thereon.[52]

Agreement as to payment. Where the executor of a shipowner authorized the master of the ship to pay to himself a debt due him from decedent out of the first earnings of the ship, being then unaware of the insolvency of the estate, the master was not entitled, after the estate proved insolvent, to retain the amount of such debt as against the executor.[53]

[§ 1759] F. Commissioners or Auditors—1. Appointment. The statutes usually provide, in the case of an insolvent decedent's estate, that upon the petition of the personal representative[54] or creditors,[55] the probate court may appoint suitable and disinterested commissioners or auditors who shall audit and examine the claims of all creditors submitted within a certain period and report for allowance accordingly.[56] Persons having an interest in the proceedings, either direct or indirect, are disqualified thereby and should not be appointed as commissioners.[57] Commissioners are, however, sometimes dispensed with by statute, with procedure being before the probate court.[58]

[§ 1760] 2. Powers. After appointment and assignment of the estate to the commissioners all claims and causes of action should be presented for allowance to them,[59] and where the commissioners become vested with the legal interest in decedent's choses in action all suits thereon should be brought by them.[60]

[§ 1761] G. Collection and Management of Estate—1. In General. Creditors are sometimes given, by statute, the right to nominate and elect an administrator of the unadministered assets of an estate which has been decreed to be insolvent.[61] In the collection and management of an insolvent estate the usual rule as to the diligence and good faith required of executors and administrators applies, and their liability is governed accordingly;[62] and where the collection and management of the estate is committed to commissioners or syndics they are governed by the same rule.[63] An administrator is liable for rents and profits collected after the estate has been decreed insolvent, although it subsequently appears that the estate when closed will be found solvent.[64]

The debt of a surety to the estate of his deceased principal will not be enforced where the estate is insolvent and the surety is liable as such for a sum largely in excess of the estate's claim against him.[65]

[§ 1762] 2. Redemption of Property. An executor or administrator is not justified in paying out of an insolvent estate, for the redemption of property, an amount in excess of its value, and the creditors may repudiate such a transaction;[66] but they cannot claim the benefit of the transaction and insist that the representative shall account for the property recovered for the estate solely by virtue of the contract which they repudiated.[67] Representatives of an insolvent estate cannot redeem property for the benefit of the widow.[68]

[§ 1763] 3. Rights of Heirs. An heir of an insolvent intestate cannot maintain assumpsit for money had and received against the administrator for his share of the proceeds of land sold by the administrator,[69] nor is the administrator of an insolvent estate liable to an heir of the estate of the intestate for rents received for land rented by him at public auction and held as assets.[70] Negligence in the management of an insolvent estate cannot be charged against the administrator at the instance of the heirs, where such negligence does not affect their interest.[71]

[§ 1764] 4. Avoiding Preferences. The executor or administrator cannot avoid a preference given by decedent during his lifetime to one of his creditors,[72] unless by virtue of statutory authority.[73]

[§ 1766] 2. Respecting Realty. In some jurisdictions it is held that a decree or declaration of insolvency entitles the personal representative to possession and control of the realty, and that he may thereafter maintain actions respecting the same;[82] but there is also authority for the view that, notwithstanding the declaration of insolvency, the right to maintain such actions is in the heir, until he is actually divested.[83]

[§ 1767] I. Sales and Conveyances under Order of Court.[84] Where an estate is insolvent, the creditors are entitled to have both the real and personal property within the jurisdiction appropriated in satisfaction of their demands;[85] and sales under order or sanction of the court may be procured accordingly.[86] It is usually the duty of the representative to proceed within a reasonable time to procure such sale,[87] but a creditor may also file a bill on behalf of himself and all other creditors for the purpose of having the land sold to pay their claims,[88] provided he does so within the time prescribed by statute in such cases.[89] A meeting of the creditors has been held not a necessary prerequisite to a sale.[90] Jurisdiction to order such sales is sometimes a matter of statutory regulation,[91] but it has been held that where an insolvent estate has been removed from the probate court to a court of chancery, the original general jurisdiction of the Streetman, 133 Ga. 760, 66 SE 883 (holding also that in an action by an administrator of the obligee of a bond for title to land, against the obligor in possession, for an accounting of the rents and the sale to pay the obligor, and recover the excess, where the pleadings admitted that the obligor was in possession, and it appeared that the administrator could not redeem because of the insolvency of the estate, and that the land was worth more than the sum claimed by the obligor, the granting of a nonsuit was erroneous).

[c] Proof of insolvency.—(1) In case of an application for the sale of real estate to pay debts of a deceased insolvent, primary proof of the insolvency stands in place of full proof until full proof is demanded, but such demand dispenses with the primary proof prescribed by the testamentary system. Talliafer, 4 Heisk (Tenn.) 352 (when it becomes necessary in the settlement of an insolvent estate to sell real or personal property, the county court has jurisdiction to make such sale whenever the amount of the assets latter court extends to authorizing a sale of land by way of compromise.[92] A decree for sale of an insolvent estate under proceedings allowed only in the case of solvent estates is erroneous;[93] but if jurisdiction has attached, errors or irregularities in the proceedings will not invalidate the sale.[94] As in other cases of needful sales of real estate, the heirs or devisees should be made parties before an order or license can properly issue,[95] and creditors by filing their claims, become quasi parties, and are bound by the proceedings.[96] An averment in a petition for the sale of realty that some years before the estate had regularly been declared insolvent, although perhaps insufficient on demurrer, is, in the absence of a direct attack, sufficient to call into existence the jurisdiction of the probate court to sell the land.[97] To establish the insolvency of the estate under proceedings for a sale of the land there need not be a judgment of insolvency in the probate court,[98] but it must appear that the estate was duly represented insolvent, that commissioners were duly appointed, and that their report showing the estate to be insolvent was duly made and accepted.[99] Where a decree confirming a judicial sale recited that all the conditions imposed by the decree ordering the sale had been complied with, and the deed to the purchaser recited that the consideration amounted to a specified sum of money, and in the accounting of the administrators making the sale, the estate being insolvent, that amount was charged against them as being received from the purchaser, payment was sufficiently shown as against a collateral attack on the sale on the ground that the consideration was never paid.[1] Where a decree authorizing a judicial sale of an insolvent estate authorized an administrator to name a place for the sale, and the sale was, in fact, made at a place other than the county seat, it was held that the decree authorizing the administrator to name the place of sale was the act of the court, and the sale was valid.[2] The syndic's consent to the sale of mortgaged property on credit and without appraisement is binding on the heirs unless they show that they were injured by it.[3]

[§ 1768] J. Presentation and Allowance of Claims[4]—1. Presentation—a. Necessity of Presentation. It is usually required that claims against the insolvent estate must, in order that they may be lawfully allowed or paid, be presented, duly verified, to the commissioners or the probate court within a specific time limited by statute, failing in which the creditor loses his right,[5] although under some statutes a lien creditor may have a lien declared in his favor without first proving his debt, received by the personal representative, exclusive of real estate, does not exceed three thousand dollars. Up to that point the county and chancery courts have concurrent jurisdiction; but above that amount of assets, exclusive of real estate, the jurisdiction of the chancery court is exclusive).

The judicial declaration of insolvency of an estate, of course, concludes, as far as that proceeding may under our statutes, the insufficiency of both the real and personal property to pay the debts of the estate. Regardless of its effect upon the rights of the heir, he not being a party to the proceeding looking to the declaration of insolvency by the court, section 326 of the Code of 1896 clothes the judicial ascertainment of this financial status with an evidential power to make out a prima facie case for a decree of sale when the sale of the real estate of the estate is sought by the executor or administrator").

[c] Judgments. — The requirements, etc., that all claims against the estate must be filed within six months from the declaration of the insolvency apply to judgments rendered against intestate prior to decree of insolvency, and not to a judgment rendered against the administrator of such estate. Woodall v. Wright, 142 Ala. 205, 37 S 846.

[d] One against whom the representative has brought suit may file in offset a claim larger than that on which he is sued, although the debt to him is not yet due, and in such case the creditor is entitled to judgment for the balance and need not present his claim to the commissioners of insolvency, but the judgment, when rendered, is to be presented to the judge of probate and by him added to the claims allowed by the commissioners. Bigelow v. Folger, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 255.

[e] A representative's statement of claims which have come to his knowledge, filed with a report of insolvency pursuant to statute, does not indicate that there has been a presentment of claims included therein or avoid the bar of the statute of nonclaim as to a claim included in such statement but not properly presented. McDowell v. Jones, 58 Ala. 25.

[f] A payment on a claim is a fact tending to show its due presentation. Pharis v. Leachman, 20 Ala. 662.

[g] When new presentation and allowance dispensed with.—In the practice of some states, where a claim against an estate has been allowed by the executor or administrator in the usual way, and the account is left with him, and the estate is afterward declared probably insolvent, but no commissioners of insolvency are appointed, the claim should be reported to the court as a valid one, without a new presentation and allowance thereof, unless the holder and certain preferred claims need not be presented.[6] A creditor whose claim has not been filed before the commissioners cannot sue the executor or administrator, although the estate finally proves to be actually solvent,[7] unless the claim is one which is privileged or preferred by statute and need not be proved or presented to the commissioners.[8] But where the claim is one which could not be presented to the commissioners, it may be enforced against any estate remaining after the payment of claims allowed by the commissioners,[9] and a creditor, whose claim was not presented in time, may sometimes enforce the same against assets subsequently discovered;[10] but a contrary view has been expressed.[11] It has been held that failure to present the claim does not prevent its being offset against a claim afterward made upon the creditor by the executor or administrator.[12] Where property remains unaccounted for by the administrator a provision of the statute in relation to insolvent estates that if a claim is not presented to the commissioners within a year it shall be forever barred does not apply.[13]

[§ 1769] b. Right to Present. Any one having a valid claim against the estate may present and prove it,[14] and the creditors may pursue their claims and have them allowed, in every jurisdiction where administration is taken, until they have obtained full payment,[15] although in such case what the creditor has received in one jurisdiction must be taken into account in another jurisdiction.[16]

A creditor whose claim is barred by the general statute of nonclaim is not entitled to share in the distribution of the estate when it has been declared insolvent.[17]

[§ 1770] c. Claims Presentable. As a general rule such claims, and only such claims, may be presented to the commissioners for allowance as are present and positive debts or fixed liabilities susceptible of a present valuation,[18] and not claims which depend on such contingencies that they may never become due.[19] A claim which is not provable before the commissioners cannot be ascertained in is notified by the executor or administrator that he has rejected the claim. Haley v. Krug, 1 Oh. Cir. Ct. 44, 1 Oh. Cir. Dec. 27.

[h] Proof of presentation by one witness is sufficient where the statute of nonclaim is set up but presentation is not positively denied. Pharis v. Leachman, 20 Ala. 662.

[i] Ignorance of the pendency of the insolvency proceedings does not relieve a creditor from the effect of nonpresentation. Stevens v. King, 74 N. H. 144, 65 A 944.

[j] Opening commission.—Under a statute allowing a commission of insolvency to be opened by the probate court, the claim of the creditor in whose favor the commission is opened is not barred by any of the statutes of limitation in consequence of a lapse of time subsequent to the close of the first commission. Ostrom v. Curtis, 1 Cush. (Mass.) 461.

equity and added by decree to their report.[20] A secured creditor who has applied the value of the securities in his hands on the debt can prove only the balance against an insolvent estate.[21]

[§ 1771] d. Time for Presentation. The time for presentation is either fixed by statutes varying somewhat in the different jurisdictions, or left to be fixed by the probate court within certain limits;[22] and as a rule the time begins to run from the declaration of insolvency.[23] Presentation must of course be made within the time so allowed.[24] An extension of the time for presentation, at the court's discretion, for a limited period, is allowed under the statutes of some jurisdictions, when a proper case arises.[25] But where a notice stating the time for presentation has been published, the court cannot, after the estate has been declared insolvent, order a notice shortening the time originally fixed.[26]

[§ 1772] e. Statement and Verification. In the absence of a specific statutory requirement any statement of a claim against an insolvent estate is sufficient which, when taken in connection with the affidavit accompanying it, if any, fairly discloses an existing liability, and enables the commissioners or court to understand it and to act intelligently.[27] Under some statutes the claim must be verified by the affidavit of the claimant[28] or his agent,[29] or attorney,[30] made before the proper officer.[31] Unless the statute provides otherwise this affidavit may be made at any time before, or at the time of, the final settlement of the estate.[32]

Valuing security. A secured claimant is sometimes required in asserting his claim to put a specified value on his security,[33] but where a partner has individually joined as a maker in a promissory note of his firm, he is directly and primarily liable, and the creditor is not compelled to value security held by him on the estate of a third person.[34]

[§ 1773] f. Sufficiency of Presentation or Filing. Claims must be presented and filed in the place and manner prescribed by statute therefor.[35] Where properly presented the claim does not lose its status as to presentation, because the judge has allowed it to be taken from the office for a special purpose and it has become mislaid or not returned through inadvertence,[36] or because he fails to docket it,[37] or the clerk fails to file it.[38] Claims presented to the administrator within the required time, but not filed with the clerk as required by statute within the time prescribed, are nevertheless entitled to be paid if the estate ultimately proves solvent.[39]

Where a claim is withdrawn upon the administrator's false representation of solvency, this is not an abandonment of the claim, and the claim should be allowed if refiled before the assets are distributed.[40]

[§ 1774] 2. Proof of Claims. Where the claim is properly filed and its validity is not disputed by the executor or administrator, the affidavit of the claimant, if regular, is sufficient to establish it and no other proof should be called for;[41] but if the claim or affidavit is duly objected to, the creditor must prove his claim by competent evidence.[42]

Notes and obligations of the deceased insolvent are not conclusive proof of the debts of which they are evidence, but such additional proof by affidavit or otherwise should be furnished as will satisfy the commissioners or other tribunal of the fairness and validity of the claim.[43] It is not always deemed necessary to produce the original note or instrument on which the debt is founded, and if a claim is disallowed and then sued at common law plaintiff is not confined to the proof he produced before the commissioners.[44]

Judgment. Where a defendant dies pending a suit, and the administrator comes in to defend, the judgment rendered against decedent's estate is to be laid before the commissioners of insolvency and by them received as conclusive evidence of the debt and reported by them accordingly.[45]

A presumption that the necessary proof of the ownership of the claim was made will arise where the record does not show that plaintiff, to whom a claim against the insolvent estate was decreed, was not the proprietor.[46]

[§ 1775] 3. Objections and Proceedings Thereon. In proceedings before the court or commissioners with reference to a claim filed against the insolvent estate, so far as the statutes sanction, objections to the claim may be filed by the executor or administrator,[47] or by the distributees,[48] or other creditors.[49] Such objections must, however, be made and filed within the time prescribed by statute therefor,[50] or, in the absence of a statutory provision limiting the time, within a reasonable time;[51] but it has been held that an objection that the claim was not filed [52] or verified [53] within the time prescribed by statute may be made at any time before the hearing or at the hearing, and that matters occurring after the declaration in insolvency, which are a valid bar to the demand, or which deprive the creditor of all right in equity and good conscience to share in the distribution, may be shown at any time before a final decree declaring the amount of the claim and the ratable proportion of the assets to which the claimant is entitled.[54] The defense that a claim was not filed within the statutory period may be raised by exceptions to the report of the master, or by a motion to dismiss the claimant's petition.[55] Unless objections are filed the allowance of a claim duly filed is usually a matter of right and no objection thereto can be heard in the proceedings before the court or commissioners,[56] except where defenses have arisen after the time for filing objections has expired.[57] If there is a conflict of evidence upon the facts of the claim, an issue may be submitted to the jury for determination;[58] but if a jury is not demanded, it is the duty of the judge to decide the issue under the rules prevailing in courts of law.[59] Where a claim has been transferred before objection is filed to its allowance, the transferee may intervene and become the actor, where issues are formed against its allowance.[60]

[§ 1776] 4. Allowance or Rejection. Claims against an insolvent estate, arising in decedent's lifetime, are to be decided upon as they existed on the date of his death.[61] In some jurisdictions the power of allowing or disallowing claims belongs to the commissioners, and their action in this respect is binding upon the estate and its creditors unless seasonable objection is made thereto,[62] or there is fraud in the proceedings before the commissioners.[63] The commissioners in such proceedings must give due notice of their meetings to all creditors,[64] and they combine so far the powers of law and equity that they ought to allow a claim which a court of equity would enforce.[65] In other jurisdictions the probate court is invested with power in such matters.[66] In general the commissioners should reckon the total allowance of claims upon fair principles which do justice to all the creditors alike,[67] and should offset mutual debts or claims between each creditor and decedent, and report only the balance which they find due.[68] A judgment and costs of suit against decedent's estate may be added to the list of claims against the estate,[69] or a judgment against the claimant in favor of the estate may be deducted from his claim.[70] Interest on the claim may be allowed in a proper case,[71] but the disallowance of interest on a mortgage note on the ground of usury is not conclusive on the mortgagee on the question of usury in a subsequent action to foreclose the mortgage.[72] The allowance should be positive and intelligible in expression as to the amount allowed.[73] The allowance is not a judgment which becomes dormant by lapse of time as against newly discovered assets of such estate.[74] The allowance may be impeached for fraud by one sought to be affected by such allowance, who was not a party or privy to the proceeding,[75] and a claim allowed in favor of an administrator may be disproved in an action on his bond.[76] As a personal representative who has presented his own claim against the estate cannot elect to proceed at law or in equity against himself, the jurisdiction of the orphans' court cannot be taken away;[77] but, if the claim is not fraudulent, the orphans' court cannot disallow it simply on the ground that limitations have run against it.[78] The rejection of a claim secured by a pledge, mortgage, or other lien, only bars the right of such claim to any portion of the general fund in the hands of the administrator for payment, and does not discharge the lien.[79]

[§ 1777] 5. Report of Commissioners. After receiving and adjudicating claims against the insolvent estate, the commissioners should make their report to the court of probate, within the prescribed time;[80] but it has been held that the report of a commission to examine claims is not void because not made within the time limited in the order of appointment.[81] The report should not embrace preferred claims,[82] and it is sufficient if it states simply that a claimant was allowed a sum named, even though he made several distinct claims.[83] It need not appear of record that the report of the commissioners was made under oath,[84] or that the advertisement of their meeting was made according to the directions of the court.[85] The report is in the nature of a judgment and is conclusive upon all interested therein who fail properly to object thereto,[86]

(2) The ascertainment of the validity and amount of the demand of a creditor in the probate court has the force and effect of a judgment in personam against the representative and may be assailed by the legatee for fraud, or when the administrator claims credit for it the legatee may show that defenses existed, and that by proper diligence he could have prevented it from being obtained. especially where it has been accepted and approved by the probate court,[87] and the court should not thereafter reopen the report unless the former orders were null and void,[88] or except to correct a mistake[89] or supply an omission.[90] The report is not conclusive, however, upon one who was not a party to the proceedings, and had no right to appeal therefrom,[91] and where a claim was filed merely by way of notice and was considered as withdrawn at the time of the report, it was held that such claim had not been adjudicated on.[92] Objection to the report must be taken by way of exceptions thereto.[93] It is the duty of the representative to give notice of a pending suit against the estate to the commissioners and to insist that a reservation be made to meet the judgment in such suit, and if he does not, and the report of the commissioners is accepted, it seems he will be liable to the creditor for his pro rata share of the assets.[94]

[§ 1778] 6. Reference of Disputed Claims. A submission of disputed claims to referees is sometimes permitted where the claims submitted to the commissioners have been rejected by them in whole or in part.[95] The referees' report in such cases should include the evidence upon which they based their report;[96] and, if erroneous, may be set aside by the probate court upon exceptions taken,[97] or may be recommitted to the referees if it appears to the court that the ends of justice will thus be best subserved.[98]

In General. Any person interested or aggrieved,[99] as, for example, the personal representative,[1] a creditor,[2] or even, it has been held, an heir or distributee,[3] has ordinarily the right to appeal from the report of the commissioners allowing or rejecting claims,[4] or from the action of the probate court in accepting or rejecting such report,[5] or allowing or disallowing

If we should sustain this appeal and send the case back to have the distribution corrected, the only possible result would be a small increase in the dividend of the other creditors. [b] Appeal from allowance of part and disallowance of part.—The superior court was not deprived of jurisdiction of an appeal from the commissioners of the insolvent estate in allowing a certain claim and disallowing another, by the mere fact that appellant, in order that final justice might be done between all the parties interested in the allowance or disallowance of an item, and which formed a part of the claim which was disallowed, combined in a single paper an appeal from the allowance of the one with an appeal from the disallowance of the other. In re Bennett, 79 Conn. 578, 65 A 946 (appeal by a single party presenting a single claim against the insolvent estate, from the commissioners of such estate to the superior court, which sought to bring up for review their action in disallowing such claim, and in allowing a claim in favor of another party for money for which decedent was accountable either to the party whose claim was allowed or to the one whose claim was disallowed, and an accounting for which to either would inure to the benefit of the party appealing, in behalf of whom decedent had assumed to receive it, was not an appeal from the acts of the commissioners in dealing with the independent claims of two or more creditors in severalty, and hence was not void, where both claims were based on the same identical payments and the same facts would be decisive as to the party to whom decedent was accountable for the money).

Venue. It has been held that an appeal from a decision of commissioners may be brought in the county where the administrator resides, although administration was granted in another county.[7]

[§ 1780] b. Proceedings for Appeal. An appeal must be taken in the manner prescribed by statute.[8] Appellant should aver in the reasons assigned for appeal the extent of his interest,[9] and how it is affected by the decision appealed from,[10] and the grounds of objection must be stated with reasonable certainty,[11] although minuteness and exact precision are not essential.[12] The appeal should be taken by appellant within the time prescribed by statute,[13] and due notice given to parties adversely interested,[14] who should, if claimants, bring their claims before the appellate court in the prescribed time and manner.[15] Even if appellee is entitled to require a bond he may waive such privilege.[16]

[§ 1781] c. Hearing and Determination. On appeal such questions or matters only will be heard and determined as were considered below and are properly brought before the appellate court.[17] Where the single issue is whether the claim itself ought to be allowed against the estate, formal pleadings are not necessary.[18] Under some statutes claimant may on appeal from the commissioners amend any defect, mistake, or informality in the statement of his claim which does not change the ground of the action.[19] The statutes sometimes permit the court to require the creditor to submit to examination under oath,[20] but such a statute does not authorize claimant to testify on his own motion.[21] Affidavits in explanation or contradiction of the testimony on which the petition is founded, as set forth in the petition itself, must be taken with notice, or filed a sufficient length of time to enable the party to examine them.[22] A statute requiring on an appeal from a commissioner a production of "attested copies of the petition, declaration, and order of notice" does not make his report competent evidence on the trial in the appellate court.[23] In the hearing and determination of a claim upon appeal, issues for a jury trial are sometimes framed.[24]

Stay of proceedings. Proceedings on appeal by a creditor of an insolvent estate from the allowance of the claim of another creditor whose demand is much larger than appellant's will be stayed to await the determination of an appeal taken by the administrator from the allowance of the claim of the appealing creditor.[25]

[§ 1782] K. Rights and Remedies of Creditors —1. In General. Under some statutes the creditors of an insolvent estate have the right to nominate a person as administrator of the property, Saunders v. Denison, 20 Conn. 521; Peck v. Sturges, 11 Conn. 420; Edwards v. Botsford, 1 Root (Conn.) 244; Ostrom v. Curtis, 1 Cush. (Mass.) 461; Reed v. Wiley, 13 Miss. 394; In re McCune, 76 Mo. 200.

[a] A confirmation of the report of referees is final as to the action of the probate court but is subject to reëxamination in the supreme court upon the law and facts. Reed v. Wiley, 13 Miss. 394.

[b] Conclusiveness of decision not appealed from.—The decision of the probate judge upon the question whether further assets have come to the hands of an executor or administrator, so as to entitle a creditor to have the commission of insolvency opened for the purpose of letting in his claim, is conclusive upon the parties unless appealed from, and is not open to inquiry upon an appeal from the decision of the commissioners allowing or disallowing the claim. Ostrom v. Curtis, 1 Cush. (Mass.) 461.

[a] Appeal from probate clerk to circuit court.—An appeal from an adjudication of claims by the probate clerk lies directly to the circuit court, and the probate judge has no jurisdiction to review the acts of such clerk. England v. Pearson, 16 Lea (Tenn.) 443, 1 SW 42.

[b] The allowance or disallowance of a claim of the representative is a matter of law and not a matter of discretion, and hence an appeal lies from the action of the court with respect to such claim. In re Donnell, 114 Me. 324, 96 A 230.

[c] An order striking out objections to claims on the ground that the objections had not been filed within the prescribed time, is not within a statute providing for an appeal "upon any issue as to the allowance of any claim against insolvent estates." Jones v. Martin, 67 N. H. 334, 39 A 971; Hilton v. Wiggin, 46 N. H. 120 [both foll Swain v. Kemp, 71 N. H. 620, 51 A 905].

[b] Ineffectual appeal.—An appeal from a decree of a judge of probate and not from the decision of the commissioners is ineffectual to confer jurisdiction, where it appears that there is no decree of the judge of probate to appeal from, and no appeal is taken from the decision of the commissioners. [§ 1783] 2. Actions[31]—a. In General. As a general rule after the representation or declaration of insolvency a creditor cannot bring an action on his full claim against the executor or administrator,[32] but exceptions to this rule have been recognized where the claim sued on is a preferred one, not affected by the insolvency,[33] where the estate proves solvent,[34] and where the estate has been wasted and not accounted for by the representative,[35] and under some statutes a suit may be prosecuted for the purpose of establishing the claim, the judgment thereon to be enforced and collected in the manner provided for the collection of other claims against the estate.[36] The creditor may also sue the representative where his claim is rejected [37] and the representative gives him notice to sue.[38] After the proceedings in insolvency a creditor's right is generally to maintain an action against the representative only for the balance allowed him by the commissioners,[39] or for his pro rata share of the dividend decreed by the probate court;[40] his usual remedy in such cases being either by a suit on the representative's administration bond [41] or

[b] Premature suit.—A suit at law on a claim against an insolvent estate which is commenced after the claim has been rejected by the insolvency commissioners, but before they have made their report and procured its acceptance by the judge of probate, is premature. Goff v. Kellogg, 18 Pick. (Mass.) 256.

[a] Necessity for decree and demand.—Before a creditor may maintain an action on the administration bond there must be a decree of distribution by the probate judge and a demand made upon the administrator for the amount decreed the creditor. Nelson v. Woodbury, 1 Me. 251.

by debt on the decree of distribution.[42] If the creditor is paid his pro rata share he cannot sue for the balance of his claim,[43] unless it is a preferred one, which has been paid only a pro rata share with general creditors.[44]

[§ 1784] b. Suits in Equity. Unless barred by lapse of time or laches,[45] a creditor of an insolvent estate may maintain a bill in equity to wind up such estate and to subject it to the payment of debts generally,[46] or he may maintain a bill to subject certain assets to the payment of his judgment,[47] to set aside a fraudulent conveyance or sale by the decedent,[48] to annul a fraudulent judgment against decedent,[49] or to restrain proceedings under a judgment at law obtained by another creditor after the estate was declared insolvent.[50] But he cannot by any such suits acquire a preference over other creditors.[51]

[§ 1785] c. Time to Sue and Limitations. Creditors are usually forbidden to bring suit within a prescribed period after the granting of administration, except as to preferred claims not affected by decedent's insolvency.[52] It is also generally provided that suits by creditors to enforce their claims are barred unless brought within a certain time prescribed by statute,[53] unless new assets come into the representative's hands;[54] but it has been held that the balance of a claim against the estate on which a dividend has been paid is not within the statute of limitations.[55]

[§ 1786] d. Defenses. The personal representative of an insolvent estate can defend a suit brought against him for a debt due from his decedent only by showing an account of administration properly settled in the probate court, or by regular proceedings in insolvency under statute,[56] and it has been held that when a claimant elects to proceed against the personal representative, the latter is not bound to interpose the bar of limitations.[57] An administrator who distributes the entire fund in his hands pending an appeal by a creditor whose claim is disallowed cannot set up such payment in bar of an action by the creditor against him on a settlement made after a reversal of the disallowance;[58] nor can the representative set up the allowance of a claim by the commissioners to the wrong person as a defense to an action by the proper person on the same claim.[59]

[§ 1787] e. Parties. The executor or administrator is generally a necessary party to proceedings against an insolvent estate in equity,[60] as are also the heirs where the bill has for its object the sale of land to pay debts.[61]

[§ 1788] f. Pleading. A declaration by a creditor's bill may be maintained after the death of a judgment debtor to reach equitable assets where the prayer is in the alternative that plaintiff is given a prior lien on the fund, or, if this cannot be granted, that there is a settlement and distribution of the debtor's assets. Riddle v. Motley, 1 Lea (Tenn.) 468.

[b] Where new assets are discovered pending proceedings of an insolvent estate, a creditor who has his claims allowed by the commissioners cannot sustain a suit for the recovery of such new assets, but should sue upon the administration bond for the benefit of all creditors in case the administrator refuse to inventory it. Tyler v. Cook, Kirby (Conn.) 391. To same effect Mansfield v. Patterson, 15 Mass. 491.

[a] Bill in alternative.—A creditor's bill may be maintained after the death of a judgment debtor to reach equitable assets where the prayer is in the alternative that plaintiff is given a prior lien on the fund, or, if this cannot be granted, that there is a settlement and distribution of the debtor's assets. [a] A demand that the executor bring the action (1) to set aside a fraudulent conveyance by decedent is not a condition precedent to an action by a creditor. Calkins v. Stedman, 146 App. Div. 202, 130 NYS 932. (2) Under the California statute a creditor must apply to the court for an order directing the representative to sue to recover property fraudulently conveyed by decedent before he himself may bring the suit to recover such property. [e] This rule does not prevail in Massachusetts where under Rev. L. c 142 § 30, and c 146 § 17, an executrix of an insolvent estate is alone entitled to sue to set aside preferences and to recover lands fraudulently conveyed, the remedy of the creditors, if she is the beneficiary of the fraudulent conveyances, being to apply for her removal. Burlingame v. Brown, 5 R. I. 410.

[b] The time elapsing while proceedings are pending in the probate court between the creditor's filing of his claim and the bringing of a suit thereon cannot be deducted to prevent the bar of the statute of limitations. Lea v. Leachman, 22 Ala. 452.

[c] Relief from failure to sue within time limited.—A statute providing that one who has a claim against the estate which has not been prosecuted in time may apply to the supreme court by petition stating the facts, and, if the court deem that justice and equity require it and that claimant has not been culpably negligent, they may give him judgment for the amount due him, does not apply to insolvent estates. itor on a claim which has been rejected by the commissioners should set forth the demand truly and state that it was laid before the commissioners and was rejected.[62] It is no objection to a declaration by a creditor that he declares against himself as administrator.[63] In an action by a creditor, suing in behalf of all, against an administratrix and the county judge for an accounting, a petition which alleges collusion between defendants and a fraudulent payment and retention of illegal fees to the prejudice of the creditors is sufficient as against demurrer.[64]

[§ 1789] g. Evidence. The insolvency of the estate may be shown in a collateral proceeding by a creditor to enforce his claim,[65] although the proof required to establish insolvency in such proceeding need not be as positive as when the insolvency is directly in issue.[66] The opinion of the commissioners as to the facts in reference to a claim, as they appeared before them, is inadmissible to establish such claim in an action against the representative thereon.[67] In an action against a deceased attorney's estate, founded upon the attorney's negligence in collecting a note, proof of the attorney's admission that he had collected the money on the note and of his promise to pay it is not competent evidence for the creditor.[68]

[§ 1790] h. Judgment and Relief. Where a creditor's claim has been allowed by the commissioners, judgment may be rendered in an action by the creditor for the amount of the dividend awarded him by the court;[69] but if notice of dissatisfaction with the commissioners' report is given by the representative as required by statute, and the creditor in consequence brings an action at law, he may have judgment for a larger or smaller sum than that allowed by the commissioners[70] together with his costs in the action.[71] But the writ, in an action of this kind, should contain no order to attach the goods of the intestate, and if it does it may be abated by plea or motion, although unless so avoided the objection is waived.[72] A general decree may be rendered for the benefit of all creditors, although the bill is on behalf of one of them only, if it appears by the answer that the estate is insolvent, and that there are other creditors to be paid ratably with plaintiff.[73] A surety who brings an action on a note of the deceased insolvent, which he did not pay until after administration had ended, and to which the representative pleads plene administravit, may be entitled to a judgment quando acciderint.[74]

[§ 1791] L. Payment of Claims and Distribution—1. In General. As a general rule all the property of a deceased insolvent debtor not set apart for the widow and minor children[75] is applicable to the payment, pro rata, of all his debts, in the order of their classification, no matter where the assets may be found or the creditors reside.[76] As a general rule claims of a higher class are to be paid before distribution to those of a lower class, taking the whole fund if necessary.[77] No priority or preference of payment can be acquired by one creditor over other creditors of the same class.[78]

Redemption of trust property wrongfully pledged. Where decedent holding stock in trust pledged part of it to a bank as security for a loan, the real owner of the stock was not entitled to have the administrator of decedent's insolvent estate use the general assets of the estate to exonerate the stock in the possession of the bank from its liability for the indebtedness as the only property pledged being trust property, there was no opportunity to marshal assets in the payment of the debts from the proceeds of the pledged property.[79]

due when the first account of the executor was audited, and who did not participate in the distribution then made, is entitled, on a further distribution, to receive an amount sufficient to give him a share of the entire estate proportionate to that received by other creditors of the same class.[80]

Where the creditor has two or more claims, a pro rata amount of the dividend allowed him should be credited on each claim.[81]

A claim of the personal representative against the insolvent estate can only be paid pro rata with other creditors of the same class,[82] but where he has paid preferred claims out of his own funds, he may become entitled to a preference by subrogation.[83]

Application of payments. Payments made by the representative from time to time go in reduction of the principal and interest then due, and where such payments exceed the interest due at the date of payment, the excess must be applied on the principal.[84]

[§ 1792] 2. New or Increased Assets. Newly discovered assets also become a trust fund for ratable distribution among creditors,[85] and the fact that certain creditors have, by their special discovery and exertion, made such assets available to the estate for distribution, gives them no preference in the distribution,[86] although it would seem that their special and reasonable outlay in procuring such assets should be deducted with other costs from the fund thus made available.[87]

A creditor whose claim has become barred by the statute of limitations has been held not entitled to participate in new assets.[88]

[§ 1793] 3. Preferred Claims.[89] The statutes usually provide what claims shall be entitled to a preference in the distribution of the assets of an insolvent estate[90] and for the classification of such claims.[91] Expenses of last illness and funeral,[92] necessary expenses of administration,[93] and debts due the government,[94] are generally recognized as privileged claims. Judgments also are sometimes accorded a preference,[95] although some of the statutes rank judgment creditors and creditors by specialty or simple contract on an equal footing of pro rata distribution.[96]

A claim for a trust fund cannot be treated as a preferred claim[97] unless the fund can be specifically identified,[98] in which case it can be recovered.[99] It has been held that the cestui que trust may par-

[a] Proceeds of trust property sold after death of trustee.—Where a trust is established against an insolvent estate, in property which has been sold as the property of such ticipate as a general creditor, to the whole amount of the trust debt, without abandoning the right to pursue the particular fund subject to the trust so far as this may be possible, provided that the trust fund recovered and the pro rata distribution do not, together, result in overpayment of his claim.[1]

A creditor entitled to a preference as to legal assets, who has been partially paid out of such assets, cannot receive any share of the equitable assets until the payments to all creditors are equalized, when he will be paid ratably out of the residue.[2]

A stipulation of the administrator that, if it is decided that one has the right of specific performance of decedent's agreement to convey land, there shall be a money judgment for the right, which shall be a preferred claim, is valid against other creditors of the estate only to the extent of the money that the estate has received in settlement of its claim against another for the land.[3]

The rules of priority are sometimes done away with by statute in case the estate of a decedent is insolvent and all creditors placed upon a basis of absolute equality.[4]

[§ 1794] 4. Secured Claims—a. Preference Out of Security. A lien or secured creditor is entitled to a preference of payment out of the specific property on which his lien exists[5] to the extent of such lien;[6] but he cannot apply the excess of the security over the amount of the secured claim to an unsecured claim which he holds and thereby obtain a preference over other creditors.[7] While money received from the sale of mortgaged land belonging to an insolvent estate cannot be taken to pay the cost of a settlement suit in which a mortgage lien is enforced, so as to leave an amount insufficient to satisfy the mortgage, if personal property is used in paying insurance, taxes, repairs, and interest on the mortgaged property to an extent exceeding what is taken to pay costs of settlement, including attorney's fee, commissioner's fee, and advertising, the mortgagee cannot complain, especially where he would have been required to pay a large part of such expenses out of the proceeds in case of foreclosure.[8]

The expenses incurred in the management of the estate must, as between secured and unsecured creditors, be paid out of the unencumbered assets, although the estate is insolvent.[9]

[§ 1795] b. Rights as to General Assets. While some statutes permit a secured creditor to prove only for the difference between the amount of his claim and the value of his security, unless he surrenders the security to go into the common fund,[10] or unless the security was furnished by a third person not primarily responsible for the debt,[11] the usual rule is that a secured creditor may prove and collect dividends on his entire claim allowed by the commissioners, without giving up or affecting his security.[12] If he thus obtains payment in full estate since the death of the trustee, the cestui que trust will not be remitted to his pro rata with the general creditors, but is entitled to recover the proceeds of the trust property. Vandever v. Freeman, 20 Tex. 333, 70 AmD 391.

[c] Application of dividend. — Where the claim allowed consisted wholly of principal the dividend should be applied solely to the principal leaving the interest unpaid. Loomis v. Eaton, 32 Conn. 550.

[d] Secured creditor must account the security inures to the benefit of the unsecured creditors,[13] while if the dividend, although insufficient to pay his claim in full, reduces it to less than the value of the security, the representative must redeem for the benefit of the estate.[14] Where, however, the creditor enforces the security, the sum realized is generally held to operate as a partial payment to reduce his claim pro tanto, so that thereafter he is entitled to dividends only on the balance,[15] unless he has been compelled to pay the amount realized into the general fund of the estate.[16] Where a decedent died owning a plantation on which there were outstanding vendor's lien notes, covering also crops for specified years, and practically the entire assets of the estate, which was insolvent, consisted of the crops for one of these years, and subsequently the plantation was sold to satisfy a judgment lien, and bought in by the widow, who conveyed a half interest in the plantation to the administrator, as an individual, by a conveyance which was not to take effect until the vendor's lien notes were satisfied, which notes the widow agreed with the administrator as an individual to pay, it was error to authorize the administrator to apply the money in his hands arising from the sale of the crop to the satisfaction of the vendor's lien notes.[17]

[§ 1796] 5. Rights of Heirs or Distributees. Any surplus remaining after paying verified claims goes, in the absence of statute, to the distributees in preference to creditors whose claims were rejected because not properly filed and verified,[18] but the settlement of the account of an administrator with reference to rents collected by him while the estate was being administered as insolvent, in which settlement the administrator was charged on behalf of the administrator de bonis non with rents embezzled by his coadministrator, does not constitute a conclusive adjudication that the heirs were absolutely entitled to the funds so accounted for which might finally remain in the hands of the administrator be bonis non for distribution as against the accountant and his sureties.[19]

[§ 1797] 6. Improper Payments. If the representative makes overpayments, or pays some creditors in full while others are left unpaid, he will be personally liable to the latter to make up their respective proportions,[20] and where a claim is paid by the representative to the wrong person under a mistake, he may be compelled as administrator to pay it again to the right person.[21] Where an administrator of an insolvent estate paid a decedent's note with his own money, and redeemed stock pledged as collateral, knowing the same to be worthless, and thereafter repaid himself from the funds of the estate, he was properly surcharged with the wrongful payment of the note.[22] As a general rule a creditor who has received more than his pro rata proportion of his debt because of the representative's mistaken belief that the estate was insolvent may be compelled to refund the excess.[23]

[§ 1798] 7. Proceedings and Decree for Distribution—a. In General. On proceedings for distribution after the lapse of the prescribed time from the grant of administration,[24] and on due notice to the parties interested or entitled to participate,[25] a decree for the distribution of the assets to the creditors in the mode prescribed by statute should be rendered,[26] the effect of which is to render the executor or administrator personally liable to and for amount received in excess of debt and interest.—Daus' Est., 8 Pa. Dist. 326.

[a] That the judge of probate is himself a creditor is no valid objection to his decree ordering claims of creditors of an estate which has been administered in insolvent course to be paid in full. Probate Judge v. Tillotson, 6 N. H. 292.

[b] Form of decree.—(1) Sometimes the decree is made in the form of a certain per cent upon the whole claim of a creditor, and sometimes so as to ascertain the aliquot part of a claim and direct its payment (State v. Bowen, 45 Miss. 347), or (2) in the form of a percentage on the balance subject to execution in favor of each creditor,[27] and to release him from liability in his fiduciary capacity,[28] unless other assets are discovered.[29] A decree of distribution when properly rendered is generally conclusive upon all the persons interested,[30] except those who were not made parties to the proceedings,[31] unless it has been appealed from[32] or opened,[33] and, like other judgments or decrees properly rendered, cannot be impeached collaterally.[34]

[§ 1799] b. Computation of Dividends. The indebtedness on which the apportionment of assets is reckoned has been held to be the debt at the time of the insolvent's death,[35] although in other jurisdictions it is held to be only the balance due at the time of apportionment.[36] Where a creditor has realized a part of his claim, this should be considered in determining his pro rata dividend.[37] To ascertain the amount due the creditors, interest is sometimes reckoned on their allowances,[38] but such an allowance has also been held improper.[39] After a dividend is decreed no future interest will accrue on such dividend relative to the estate,[40] and if the representative so uses the proceeds of the estate as to render himself personally liable for interest, an action to charge him therewith must be brought against him in his personal capacity.[41] Under some statutes the judge of probate may correct the list of claims allowed by commissioners conformably to special facts arising after their report, such as a change in the condition of claimants or the assets, and compute dividends on the corrected list.[42]

[§ 1800] 8. Accounting and Settlement[43]—a. In General. It is the duty of the personal representative of an insolvent estate to settle his accounts of administration after the commissioners' report[44] within the time prescribed by statute.[45] in the prescribed manner,[46] and on a proper citation and notice.[47] He should also settle with a successor in the trust, if one is appointed.[48] On final settlement it is the province of the probate judge to determine the proper charges against,[49] and credits in favor of,[50] the representative, and to pass due on the claim (Cromwell v. Herron, 11 Oh. Cir. Ct. 448, 5 Oh. Cir. Dec. 196).

[c] Reservation of assets. — A statutory provision that a probate judge in ordering a dividend among creditors shall leave in the hands of the administrator a sum sufficient to pay a creditor who has a contingent claim, which could not be proved as a debt in the commission, in proportion to what has been paid to the other creditors, does not apply to a surety on a promissory note which has been proved by the holder and been allowed to him by the commissioners. 45. Eaton v. Brown, 8 Me. 22 (under a statute penalizing an administrator of an insolvent estate for failure to settle his account of administration within six months after the commissioners have reported a list of claims, the administrator is only bound to exhibit his account within that time and present himself to verify or support it; and the penalty does not attach where the administrator files a supplemental account consisting of items coming to his knowledge after the allowance of his former account, or arising from a realization of assets previously deemed worthless).

upon objections properly raised to his administration of the estate.[51] If, after final settlement of the estate as insolvent, there appears a balance, the persons entitled thereto may compel a settlement and distribution in their favor upon due notice to the representative.[52]

[§ 1801] b. Proceedings—(1) Time for Institution. A bill for the final settlement of an insolvent estate must be brought within the time prescribed by statute,[53] unless a delay beyond that period is justified by peculiar circumstances.[54]

[§ 1802] (2) Parties. The only necessary parties to proceedings for the settlement of an insolvent estate are usually the personal representative, on the one side, and the creditors whose claims have been allowed, or their assignees, on the other;[55] but legatees, distributees, or other persons interested may also appear or be joined as defendants,[56] and fraudulent grantees or donees of a deceased debtor may be joined as defendants, although they claim different parts of the property under separate gifts or conveyances.[57]

[§ 1803] (3) Pleading and Proof. The persons made parties to a bill for a settlement or coming in by petition must describe and set forth with certainty the origin and amounts of their claims,[58] and prove the same, unless they are admitted by the representative to be just and due.[59]

[§ 1804] (4) Judgment. The judgment of the probate court on such settlement is final and conclusive,[60] unless appealed from[61] or opened,[62] and cannot be attacked collaterally.[63]

[§ 1805] (5) Appeal. An appeal from a final judgment or decree rendered in a final settlement of an insolvent estate may be taken[64] by the personal representative,[65] a distributee,[66] or a creditor,[67] but upon appeal the appellate court may not hear such objections as have been waived below.[68] The appellate court may on reversal remand the cause for further proceedings.[69] The costs may be taxed against one of the parties[70] or apportioned among both.[71]

[a] The administrator, and not a distributee, is the proper party to sue for misfeasance or neglect of duty by an attorney employed by the administrator to settle the estate, the distributee's remedy being removal of the administrator and appointment of his successor, if he is a party to the wrong. Norton v. Lilley, 210 Mass. 214, 96 NE 351.

[b] An administrator is the proper person to bring suit to impress a trust on real estate purchased with money fraudulently obtained from his intestate, and invested in such real estate after the latter's death, since the action is for personal property, which would be in the administrator's custody until after distribution, and the fact that the money was invested in real estate was immaterial. Morris v. Vyse, 154 Mich. 253, 117 NW 639, 129 AmSR 472.

[c] An action for the recovery of personal property of a decedent, or or be sued[75] upon causes of action connected with the estate committed to his care; and the personal representative of one estate may maintain an action against the personal representative of another estate.[76] A general creditor of a decedent cannot maintain a bill against the personal representative for the recovery of money due his estate, must be brought by the personal representative, except, where he refuses to sue, the action may be brought by a creditor or heir at law, making the personal representative a party defendant. Bennett v. Bennett, 134 Ky. 444, 120 SW 372.

[d] Partition suit.—(1) Code [1896] § 3187, which provides that the chancery court shall have jurisdiction to divide or partition, or to sell for division or partition any property, real or personal, held by joint owners or tenants in common, etc., and § 3185, which declares that should any of the parties interested in property held by joint owners or tenants in common die, the provisions of the article shall fully apply to his executor or administrator, confer power on an executor to file a bill for partition in his own name in the chancery court. Schuessler v. Goodhue, 146 Ala. 637, 41 S 958. (2) An administrator required to sell real estate to pay debts is not justified in joining with the heirs in partition against another heir, with a view to compel him to account for the rental value of the property while in possession, and thus wipe out his claim allowed against the estate. Owings v. Owings, 150 Mich. 609, 114 NW 393.

[e] Setting aside conveyance.—An executor and testamentary trustee may sue in his representative capacity to set aside a conveyance made by him and his coexecutors and cotrustees as procured by fraud, although he was a party to the fraudulent transaction. Smith v. David Stevenson Brewing Co., 50 Misc. 395, 100 NYS 521 [aff 117 App. Div. 690, 102 NYS 672].

[f] Recovery of assets conveyed away by mistake.—If there are no intervening equities, an executor can maintain an equitable action to have restored to the trust estate a portion of its assets, which he has, by mistake as to his authority under the will, conveyed away without consideration. Wentzel v. Chesley, 28 Oh. Cir. Ct. 192.

[g] Action for services of decedent.—Although the personal estate of an intestate, living in France at the time of his death, under the laws of France devolved on his heirs at law, to the exclusion of all others, an administrator de bonis non appointed by the surrogate's court of the county of New York may sue in New York for services performed by the intestate in Paris under a contract with defendant, a domestic corporation. Homans v. New York L. Ins. Co., 55 Misc. 574, 106 NYS 929.

[h] Where a contract for the purchase of land is made with executors, they have prima facie the right to forfeit or enforce the contract by suit or otherwise. Stein v. Waddell, 37 Wash. 634, 80 P 184.

[i] An action to recover for royalty due on a sale of coal in place is a personal action, and must be brought in the name of the personal representative, and not in the name of the heirs at law, although the estate is otherwise fully settled up. Hutson Coal Co. v. Hughes, 29 Oh. Cir. Ct. 139.

[j] Effect of personal liability.—The fact that under the statute an administrator is personally liable for cotton taken from the land of his intestate and sold by him, does not preclude him from suing the purchaser for the value thereof. McGraw v. Robinson Mercantile Co., 95 Miss. 828, 49 S 260.

[k] An administrator's participation in a conversion of estate funds does not preclude him from suing to recover them. Scully v. McGrath, 207 N. Y. 61, 94 NE 195 [rev 136 App. Div. 905, 120 NYS 1145].

[l] Action on notes not appraised.—A statute providing that no action shall be brought on notes and bonds owned by a decedent, unless appraised, does not apply to notes not taxable in the state, and sent by decedent's personal representative to an attorney for suit. Austin v. Calloway, 73 W. Va. 231, 80 SE 361, AnnCas1916E 112.

[m] Suit by executors before appointment.—A suit by persons named as executors, although not yet appointed, to restrain testator's widow from unlawfully endeavoring to hinder them in the performance of their duty in violation of her antenuptial agreement with testator, is within the jurisdiction of a court in equity. Eaton v. Eaton, (Mass.) 124 NE 37.

[n] Representative cannot sue for use of stranger.—Thrift v. Baker, 144 Ga. 508, 87 SE 676.

[o] Intent to defraud beneficiaries.—Although the right to sue to protect an equitable interest in a decedent's estate because of payments under a bond for title is in the administrator, the rule does not apply where the administrator and the obligor enter into a conspiracy to defraud those interested in the estate for the personal benefit of the administrator. Kinard v. George, 142 Ga. 111, 82 SE 560.

[p] Breach of contract; representative not interested.—Where testator gave his residuary estate to his wife for life with remainder over, and provided that the executor should for the performance of the will sell his real estate, and the wife, as executrix, conveyed real estate in consideration of a specified sum and an agreement by the purchaser with her individually to support her for life, a breach of the purchaser's agreement to support the wife gave her a right of action personally which on her death survived to her representatives, but the representatives of the testator after her death could not sue therefor. Fifield v. White, 139 App. Div. 390, 123 NYS 1094 [aff 207 N. Y. 701 mem, 101 NE 1102 mem].

[a] Suit upon rejected claim.—Where an executor, or the judge of the superior court sitting in probate, rejects the claim of a creditor against the estate, the creditor may sue the executor thereon in the proper court. Garver v. Thoman, 15 Ariz. 38, 135 P 724.

[b] Theory of action by creditor.—Where a creditor sues the administratrix to recover a fund given by decedent to one to hold in trust for another during the donor's life, and at his death to become the cestui's absolutely, the creditor must, in order to maintain his action, rely either on the administratrix's right to the fund for the payment, or on some special property or lien thereon. Beakes Dairy Co. v. Berns, 139 App. Div. 733, 124 NYS 365.

[c] Persons entitled to distributive shares of an estate in the hands of an executor may maintain an action against such executor therefor. St. Mary's Hospital v. Perry, 152 Cal. 338, 92 P 864; Le Mesnager v. Variel, 144 Cal. 463, 7 P 988, 103 AmSR 91.

[d] Recovery of legacy.—Assumpsit lies against an executor to recover a legacy, where the debts of the estate have been settled, the final account approved, and the legacy ordered paid, there being sufficient funds in the hands of the executor to pay it. Anderson v. Patty, 168 Ill. A. 151.

[e] The remedy of a person entitled to rents wrongfully collected by an administrator is by an action at law, the surrogate having no jurisdiction to determine controversies arising from such matters. Matter of Van de Walker, 79 Misc. 661, 141 NYS 325.

[f] Pending administration, a suit cannot be maintained by devisees against the executor or administrator to establish a liability arising out of the management and disposition of the estate. Berry v. Hindman, 61 Tex. Civ. A. 291, 129 SW 1181 (in view of Rev. St. [1895] art 2011 requiring an executor indebted to his testator to account for the debt from the time it is due, the same as if it were money in his hands, an obligation due the estate from an executor, pending administration, stands on the same basis as one accruing before he was appointed, and hence devisees cannot recover it pending the administration).

[g] When entire estate assigned to widow.—Where the estate is of less value than fifteen hundred dollars, and has been assigned to his widow, an action cannot be maintained against the administratrix on a note of the decedent. Wills v. Booth, 6 Cal. A. 197, 91 P 759.

[h] Where performance of a contract of decedent becomes impossible by reason of his death, an action will not lie against his personal representative on such contract, although it stipulates that it shall bind the heirs, executors, and administrators of the parties. Browne v. Fairhall, 210 Mass. 290, 100 NE 556, 45 LRANS 349 (an agreement to buy corporate stock, part payment to be made in cash and property, and promissory notes to be executed by the purchaser to the amount of two hundred thousand dollars, in such amounts and running for such terms up to three years as the purchaser should see fit, all of which was to be delivered in escrow within ninety days, became impossible for performance by the death of the purchaser within the ninety days by reason of the personal character of the stipulation as to the notes).

[i] Action for stock assessment.—An insolvent bank cannot maintain an action against the executors of a deceased stockholder for an assessment on the stock necessary for liquidation levied after a final decree for the distribution of his estate, appealed from only so far as it determines the distributees. Union Sav. Bank v. De Laveaga, 150 Cal. 395, 89 P 84.

[j] Action to set aside deed.—No action can be maintained by a creditor to set aside an executor's deed as in fraud of creditors. Magoun v. Quigley, 115 App. Div. 226, 100 NYS 1037.

[k] Responsibility for acts of administration.—"In so far as plaintiffs sought to hold the administrator personally responsible for acts of administration, and to contest the existence and amount of the expenses incurred in the administration, and the distribution among the heirs of any balance then in the hands of the administrator, they should not have had recourse to a direct, separate action against the administrator, but set forward their objection by way of opposition to the account filed." Trahan's Succ., 118 La. 762, 763, 43 S 400.

76. Carlisle v. Farrow, 74 S. C. 527, 54 SE 766.

to charge the personal estate only, without showing some ground of equity jurisdiction, such as inadequacy of the legal remedies, inability to obtain satisfaction by judgment and execution, or necessity for discovery.[77]

Suit by representative against himself. It has been held that an executor or an administrator cannot maintain a suit against himself to recover a debt due to him from decedent,[78] but it has also been held that the probate court can order an administrator as such to bring an action against himself individually on his personal note owing decedent's estate.[79]

Special or temporary administrator. The right to sue and be sued extends under some statutes to special as well as general administrators,[80] but in the absence of an allegation of debts a special administrator has no capacity to sue to set aside deeds to realty alleged to have been executed by decedent through fraud, undue influence, and mental incapacity.[81] A statute defining the powers of a temporary administrator to be to take into his possession personal property, to preserve it, and to collect choses in action, does not authorize a temporary administrator to sue in equity to have it adjudged that the estate is the owner of a share of corporate stock, the certificate for which is already in the temporary administrator's possession, and to require a transfer of the share on the corporate books to the estate.[82]

A right to sue an administrator is not waived by bringing an action against the heirs before appointment of the administrator.[83]

[§ 1807] B. Capacity in Which Representative Sues or Is Sued—1. Actions by Representatives—a. General Rules—(1) Causes of Action Accruing in Decedent's Lifetime. The general rule is that on all causes of action accruing during the lifetime of decedent, the executor or administrator must sue in his representative capacity and not otherwise.[84]

[§ 1808] (2) Causes of Action Accruing after Decedent's Death. With respect to causes of action arising subsequent to the death of decedent, it is well settled that the executor or administrator may sue in his individual capacity.[85] Some decisions go so far as to hold that the representative can sue on such causes of action only in his personal capacity,[86] but the overwhelming weight of authority supports the view that if the fruits of the recovery will be assets the representative may

"When the cause of action, whether in contract or in tort, accrues after the death of the testator or intestate, and the money if recovered will be assets, the plaintiff may declare in his representative character or in his own name, at his option. This rule prevails under the codes, as well as at common law, except that it is materially qualified where the code provides that actions must be brought by the real party in interest, and that actions by an executor or administrator, upon a cause of action belonging to him, in his representative capacity, must be brought by him in that capacity." Cauthen v. Green, 80 S. C. 432, 434, 61 SE 957.

"When a contract is made with an executor or administrator personally, after the death of the testator or intestate, or where money is received by the person sued after the death, in such cases the executor or administrator may sue either in his own name, or as executor or administrator." Mowry v. Adams, 14 Mass. 327, 329 [quot Cauthen v. Green, 80 S. C. 432, 434, 61 SE 957].

[a] The reason for the rule is "that no matter in which capacity a recovery is had the recovery becomes assets of the estate for which he is accountable, and it does not concern the defendant, whose liability is individual in any event, so that the form of judgment is necessarily the same, and the same defenses and remedies are available to the defendant whose liability will be discharged by the satisfaction of the recovery no matter in which form it may be had." Leavitt v. Jas. F. Scholes Co., 210 N. Y. 107, 103 NE 965 [rev 148 App. Div. 78, 132 NYS 1033] (quot dis. op. Laughlin, J., in the court below).

[b] Naming official character.—"Where the action accrues to the Executor or Administrator upon a contract made by or with him, as such, since the death of the Testator or Intestate; or for an injury done to, or a conversion of, the property of the Testator or Intestate, in the hands or possession of the Executor or Administrator, after the death of the Testator or Intestate, there the action may and ought to be brought in the proper name of the Executor or Administrator, describing himself to be such; but not as Executor or Administrator." Stewart v. Richey, 17 N. J. L. 164, 165. But compare Haskell v. Bowen, 44 Vt. 579, 584 ("executors and administrators who contract for the sale of their testator's or intestate's effects, or make other agreements in their representative character, . . . may sue in their individual right without naming their representative character").

[c] Transfer of interest by surviving partner to executrix.—Where the survivor of two partners, as a part division of the assets of the firm, transferred his interest in an account of the firm to the executrix of the deceased partner, a suit upon the account was properly brought by her as such executrix. Lawrence v. Vilas, 20 Wis. 381; Roys v. Vilas, 18 Wis. 169.

88. Chapman v. Davis, 4 Gill (Md.) 166.

[a] Rule not applied.—Where the widow of a member of a fraternal accident association, named as beneficiary in the application, which was in custody of the association, in ignorance of the provision in her favor, sued in her representative capacity as administratrix of his estate, and after learning of the provisions of the application continued to prosecute such action, the suit should be sustained as against an objection that she was not, in such representative capacity, the real party in interest, as the judgment would be a bar to her subsequent individual claim as beneficiary. Thompson v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Assoc., 88 Nebr. 399, 129 NW 529.

tative.[91] It has been held, however, under a code provision requiring suit to be brought in the name of the real party in interest that the personal representative must declare in his representative capacity, although the cause of action arose subsequent to decedent's death.[92]

[§ 1809] b. Particular Actions—(1) On Notes. Where a note is given to an executor or administrator in his representative capacity, he may sue on it in that capacity;[93] or, at his option, in his individual capacity without naming himself as executor or administrator.[94] For purposes of suits of representatives in their individual character, when a note is made payable to one as executor or administrator, the words "executor" or "administrator" may be regarded as merely descriptive of the person and may be rejected as surplusage.[95] Where notes or bills are indorsed or assigned to executors or administrators as such, they may sue either in their representative[96] or indi-

[b] Where an instrument made payable to the estate and not to any person or persons by name is regarded as a promise to pay the executors, there is no necessity for their suing in a representative capacity. Lyon v. Marshall, 11 Barb. (N. Y.) 241.

[c] Unauthorized acceptance of note.—Where an administrator obtained a note of third persons before its maturity, in payment of a note secured by a vendor's lien on land, payable to his intestate, which he surrendered, although he may not have been authorized to accept the note in payment, he paid a consideration for it, and it was immaterial whether he sued such third persons on the note in his character as administrator or otherwise. Brainerd v. Butte, (Tex. Civ. A.) 44 SW 575.

[d] Where the note has been indorsed by the payee or by his executor in his official capacity, the latter cannot recover it in his own name. Woodbury v. Woodbury, 47 N. H. 11, 90 AmD 555.

[e] A distinction as to the form of note.—If the note or bond is executed to him as administrator or by the use of any other terms, clearly indicating the debt to be due the estate of the testator, then the administrator should sue on it in his representative capacity and the money when collected will be assets; but if the note is executed to him "administrator" or "being administrator" then the law will hold it to be a note executed to him in his private right, such words operating as mere matter of description; and consequently suit can only be maintained on it in his own name. Perkins v. Crabtree, 5 Ark. 475.

[f] After resignation or removal.—Where an executor takes a nonnegotiable instrument from one to whom he loans money of the estate without authority, he may sue on such contract in his own name, notwithstanding he has resigned or been removed from the administration, unless it is shown that he has been in some way discharged from the liability incurred. Tomkies v. Reynolds, 17 Ala. 109.

[g] Revocation of letters testamentary.—In an action by an executor of an estate on a note payable to him as executor, etc., an answer alleging that the note belonged to the estate and that his letters testamentary had been revoked, is good. Leach v. Lewis, 38 Ind. 160.

vidual[97] capacity. An executor or administrator may also sue in his own name upon a note payable to decedent or bearer,[98] or a note payable to bearer and held originally by or transferred to decedent,[99] and it is immaterial that the time for payment had not arrived at the time of decedent's death.[1] It is also immaterial whether the administrator is domestic or foreign.[2] He may also sue in his representative capacity on such note.[3] It has been held that an executor or administrator may sue in his own right upon a negotiable note payable to decedent and indorsed by him in blank as if it were indorsed to him individually,[4] but other cases hold that an executor can sue only as such on a note payable to the order of his testator and indorsed by him.[5] If, however, the note has not been indorsed by decedent or by the personal representative in his official capacity he cannot recover upon it in his own name. He can sue on it only in his representative capacity.[6]

Death of executor or administrator. It has been held that, where a negotiable instrument is made payable to an executor or administrator, and such executor or administrator dies, an action on the instrument may be brought by his personal representative,[7] but other cases hold that in such case the administrator de bonis non of the first decedent may sue on such instrument.[8]

Action for another's benefit. It seems that a personal representative may maintain an action on negotiable instruments payable to his testator or intestate, although the beneficial ownership of such instruments is in another person, and they do not belong to the estate.[9]

[§ 1810] (2) On Bonds. An executor or administrator may sue individually, or in his representative character, on a bond made payable to him individually,[10] and when a bond is executed to him in his representative capacity he may sue on it in such capacity,[11] or individually[12] except where the statute requires suit to be brought by the real party in interest.[13] On a bond assigned to him in his representative capacity he may sue either in his individual[14] or representative[15] capacity, and he may sue in his representative capacity upon a bond running to decedent.[16]

[§ 1811] (3) On Judgments. Administrators in their representative capacity may have an action on a judgment recovered by the intestate in his lifetime.[17] Where a judgment is recovered by an executor or administrator it is a debt due to him in his personal character and he may sue on it in his own name,[18] even though the judgment was recovered in a foreign state.[19] The representative may also, however, sue in his representative capacity on such a judgment,[20] and it has been held that, where a statute requires all actions to be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, an action

[a] Reason for rule.—The property in as well as all the rights incident to a note, payable to bearer, is transferable by delivery, and amongst these, the right to sue is the most indisputable; and whether the natural import of the term itself or its legal consequence is considered the same result follows. It is in direct terms a promise to pay to the bearer and when once it passes out of the hands of the original payee it enters into the circulating medium of the country, becomes identified with it as a representative of coin, and like it is the property of him who has the legal possession and as an incident the right to sue is indispensable. by an administrator upon a judgment rendered in his favor as such must be brought by him in his representative capacity.[21] Where an administrator employed the funds of the estate in purchasing a judgment, he should be deemed to have done so in his individual capacity, and must sue for the debt in his own name.[22]

[§ 1812] (4) On Contracts Made by Representative—(a) In General. Where a contract is made by an executor or administrator a right of action arising therefrom is in his individual rather than his representative capacity.[23] He may therefore sue in his individual capacity to recover the purchase money of property of the estate sold by him,[24] or on a contract made by him with respect to the real estate of decedent.[25] Thus, where a person holding lands as administrator has leased them, he can recover the rents in his own name.[26] It has been held however that an administrator who lends money belonging to the estate may sue for it either in his representative or in his individual capacity.[27]

[§ 1813] (b) Contracts Involving Unauthorized Use of Assets. Where a personal representative by contract makes an unauthorized use of the money or choses in action of the estate this amounts to a conversion for which he is personally liable, and he may sue on the contract in his own name;[28] and it has been held that the action can only be brought in his individual capacity,[29] although there is also authority for the contrary view.[30] Where an executor was also charged with the duties of a trustee, in that he was to pay over the income of the estate to sole legatees, and before he had made an accounting and before the time for presentation of claims had expired, and less than two months after the grant of letters of administration, he gave a portion of the estate to a stockbroker to deal in stocks, this constituting an unlawful investment, the cause of action to recover the amount deposited with the broker was in the executor and those deriving their authority from that relation, and not in the executor as a trustee under the will.[31] If the administrator has settled the estate and has been discharged without having been charged with the proceeds of such a contract then he can maintain no action on such contracts or claims, and the right to sue passes to the succeeding administrator.[32]

[§ 1814] (5) To Recover Money Paid. Where a personal representative has paid out money of the estate by mistake he may recover it back in a suit brought in his individual capacity;[33] and it has also been held that such action may be properly brought in a representative capacity.[34]

Where a legacy has been paid, and thereafter the legatee forfeits his right thereto by contesting the will, an action to recover back the amount of the legacy may be brought by the executor in his representative capacity.[35]

[§ 1815] (6) On Right of Surety to Indemnity. Where a personal representative pays a debt for which decedent was surety, he may recover from the principal debtor in an action in his own name[36] or in his representative capacity.[37]

[§ 1816] (7) To Recover Land or for Injuries Thereto. Whenever an executor or administrator is entitled to possession of land, he may maintain an action in his individual capacity for a trespass complaint described plaintiffs as surviving executors under a will, and the owners and holders of the judgment sued on, which they had formerly recovered in their capacity as executors, plaintiffs were entitled to recover in their representative capacity, although in the title of the action the word "as," between the names of plaintiffs and the words descriptive of their representative capacity was omitted).

committed thereon since decedent's death;[38] but for a trespass committed during decedent's lifetime he must sue in his representative capacity.[39] If the complaint shows that he is by inheritance the sole owner of the land, the action must be brought in his individual and not in his representative capacity.[40] To recover possession of the land he may bring an action of unlawful detainer either in his representative or individual capacity,[41] ejectment in his individual[42] or representative[43] capacity, trespass to try title in his individual[44] or representative[45] capacity, or a writ of entry in his representative capacity.[46] For an interference with an incorporeal hereditament he may declare in his representative capacity,[47] or it seems in his own name, without setting up his representative character.[48]

[§ 1817] (8) For Injury to or Conversion of Personalty. Where personal property of the testator or intestate is injured or converted after his death, the executor or administrator may sue on the cause of action arising therefrom in his individual capacity.[49] It has accordingly been held that he may maintain, in his individual capacity, trover,[50] replevin,[51] detinue,[52] and trespass.[53] He is not, however, bound to sue in his individual capacity, but may sue in his representative capacity if he sees fit.[54]

[§ 1818] c. Where Representative Has Been Charged with or Has Accounted for Proceeds of Contract. Where an administrator has been charged with or has accounted for the proceeds of contracts made with decedent,[55] or with him in his representative character,[56] he may sue individually thereon.

[a] An action to recover plaintiff's distributive share of an estate is against the executor or administrator individually and not against the estate. St. Mary's Hospital v. Perry, 152 Cal. 338, 92 P 864 (the words "as executrix" in the title of the cause following defendant's name should be held to be merely descriptive).

[b] Action for proceeds of insurance policy.—Where a son gave his mother an insurance policy which ran to his executors or administrators, and the policy was collected by the son's wife as his administratrix, the mother might maintain an action against the wife in her individual capacity, for the wife, in collecting the policy, was only the mother's agent. Gledhill v. McCoombs, 110 Me. 341, 86 A 247, 45 LRANS 26, Ann Cas1914D 294.

[c] Where a suit is brought by an executor against his coexecutor and another, alleged to be interested in defeating a valid demand of the estate, the executor alleged to have personal interests inimical to those of the estate should be named defendant in his individual capacity. Quillan v. Johnson, 122 Ga. 49, 49 SE 801.

[d] Where the heir sues the administrator for moneys had and received, but there has been no adjudication of the estate, and there is nothing to show any promise by the administrator to pay any sum to plaintiff in lieu of her distributive share, the action will be dismissed. Wentz v. Blair, 232 Pa. 135, 81 A 144.

[e] Presumption as to capacity in which representative acts.—Where a levy of a fieri facias for municipal improvements, in which the lot is described as the property of S, executor, is met by an affidavit of illegality interposed by such person as owner, he is to be presumed to act in his individual, and not in his representative, capacity, although he is referred to in the affidavit as S, executor, where in the body of the affidavit he alleges that the property levied on never was held by him as executor. Stephens v. Atlanta, 119 Ga. 666, 46 SE 872 (where a fieri facias to enforce a tax for a municipal improvement described the property as that of S, executor, and an affidavit of illegality alleged that the property belonged to S individually, the court erred in dismissing it on the ground that no one but the executor had a right to object).

[f] The nature of the action will be ascertained from the pleadings, and if it appears that defendant, described as an executor, was sued as such, and not in his individual capacity, the court will so determine. Ryan v. McAdoo, 46 App. (D. C.) 117.

"Nothing is better settled than that an executor or administrator, is answerable in his official character, for no cause of action that was not created by the act of the decedent himself. In actions against the personal representative on his own contract and engagements, though made for the benefit of the estate, the judgment is de bonis propriis; and he is, by every principal of legal analogy, to answer it with his personal property." Seip v. Drach, 14 Pa. 352, 356.

[a] Recovery of funds received in representative capacity.—Executors may be sued in their representative capacity for money received by them in that capacity under a contract for the sale of premises coming to them under the will, and to which they are unable to give good title. Scheibeler v. Albee, 114 App. Div. 146, 147, 99 NYS 706 ("The $1,000 was lawfully received by the defendants in their representative capacity in dealing concerning the property of their testator. The averments of the complaint show that they have no right in that capacity now to retain such money, because they were unable to give good title to the premises which they contracted to convey. The obligation to repay this money does not arise out of a pledge of the credit of the estate of the testator. Such pledging of credit would be without authority and would bind the person making it individually instead of as a representative. The defendants having received the money in their representative capacity, an action can be maintained against them in the same capacity for its recovery").

[b] Action for rent.—The surviving executrix and trustee under a will which entitled her to the income for life and on her death directed sale of the property and distribution to testator's children, leased the premises for a term of years, the lease providing that it should bind the heirs, executors, and legal representatives of the parties. After the death of the lessee, who continued his occupancy after the death of the executor and trustee, the executors of the lessee took and retained possession, and in partition suit brought by a child of the testator admitted, by failure to answer, that as executors of the lessee they had an estate for years in the premises. It was held that they were liable for the rent in their representative capacity. Steuber v. Huber, 107 App. Div. 599, 95 NYS 348.

[c] Taxes due from deceased.—An action cannot be maintained against an executrix in her personal capacity for taxes due from the deceased during his lifetime, and, if the executrix is liable in any event, it is only in her representative capacity. Eno v. Cornish, Kirby (Conn.) 296.

[d] Circumstances not warranting personal action.—Where a will directed that testator's executor might act as attorney for the estate and make charge therefor, and the executor furnished services, assigned his claim, and the assignor brought suit against the executor and his coexecutor on the claim, the case not being one where action must first be brought against the executors and they in turn reimburse themselves out of the estate, and not imposing a personal liability on the coexecutor, the action would not lie, but the proper practice would be to present the claim for allowance against the estate. [a] Where a factor sells goods of his principal in his own name upon a credit and dies before the money is received, if it is afterward paid to the administrator in his representative character, the creditor is entitled to consider it as assets in his hands and to charge him in the same character in which he received it. De Valengin v. Duffy, 14 Pet. (U. S.) 282, 10 L. ed. 457.

[b] An executor or administrator who enters upon leasehold property held by the testator or intestate in his lifetime, or who receives the rents and profits thereof, is chargeable in the debet and detinet directly on the covenant of the lessee as an assignee, and need not be named executor, etc. In re Galloway, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 32, 34 AmD 209.

[c] Effect of laches enforcing claim.—An administrator who collects money upon a judgment founded on a suit in the name of his intestate is not individually liable to another for a share thereof belonging to such other person, unless before he appropriates the same to the use of the estate he has notice not to pay it over or unless in paying it claiming to have acted in their representative character.[62]

Rejection of descriptive words as surplusage. The rule that in an action against an executor or administrator on a claim for which he may be liable individually the words "executor" or "administrator" will be rejected as surplusage does not apply where the action was brought against him in his representative capacity alone.[63]

Recovery on cause of action not stated. Where defendant is sued as administrator of his wife's estate, on a note executed by both himself and wife, he cannot be held as an individual as on a cause of action in equity arising out of an estoppel or trust.[64]

[§ 1821] b. Actions on Contracts—(1) Of Decedent. In an action against an executor or administrator founded on a contract made by decedent, defendant must be sued in his representative character, and the judgment will not be against him personally but de bonis testatoris or intestati.[65]

[§ 1822] (2) Of Representative—(a) Consideration Arising during Decedent's Lifetime. Where the consideration for the promise of the personal representative arose during the lifetime of decedent, he may be sued thereon in his representative capacity.[66]

[§ 1823] (b) New and Independent Consideration. A contract of an executor or administrator, although made in the interest and for the benefit of the estate, if made upon a new and independent consideration moving between his promisee and himself, is his personal contract, which does not bind the estate, and he must be sued on such contract in his individual, and not in his representative, capacity.[67] The fact that he is described in the conover he has acted in bad faith. Call v. Houdlette, 70 Me. 308.

62. Burton v. Williams, 63 Nebr. 431, 88 NW 765; Bryant v. Bryant, 25 N. Y. Super. 612.

63. Edwards v. Puterbaugh, 86 Kan. 758, 760, 121 P 1116 ("The appellant's contention is that he was entitled to a judgment against Walter Puterbaugh personally, notwithstanding the failure of proof to warrant a judgment against him as executor. In the brief it is said that 'there is but one question, practically, involved in this case: The liability of the appellee, Walter Puterbaugh, individually, for the services rendered by appellant . . . and the right of appellant to recover a personal judgment against said appellee under the allegations of his petition.' Authorities are cited to the effect that the words 'executor of the estate of Frank Frorer, deceased,' in the caption and body of the petition, should be construed as mere words of description and should be rejected as surplusage. And authorities are cited which hold that where the action is against the executor or administrator it is necessary to describe him 'as' executor or 'as' administrator. The recent case of Brown v. Quinton, 80 Kan. 44, 102 P 242, 25 LRANS 71, 18 AnnCas 290, is relied upon. That was an action against an administrator brought by attorneys employed to prosecute a suit for the estate. It was held that the claim set up in the petition was a personal one, and that the word 'administrator,' referring to defendant's official character, should be regarded as descriptive and rejected as surplusage. This is the general rule, but, like most general rules, there are cases where it cannot be applied, and this is obviously one where the exception obtains. The words 'executor of the estate of Frank Frorer, deceased,' can not in the present case be regarded as mere surplusage. Other circumstances of far more importance conclusively establish the fact that the appellee was sued in his representative capacity alone. This must be true, irrespective of the importance attached to the use of the words themselves in the caption and body of the petition. The right of the appellant to obtain service upon the appellee by publication depended in this case upon whether this was an action 'brought against a nonresident of the state . . . having in this state property . . . sought to be taken by' the provisional remedy of attachment. (Civ. Code § 78.) The appellee owned no real estate or other property in this state, and the court acquired jurisdiction of the proceeding in rem or quasi in rem solely because the action was brought for the purpose of appropriating some part of whatever interest he held therein as executor. The rule recognized in the Quinton case can not avail the appellant. If it were held that the words 'executor,' etc., were mere words of description, to be rejected as surplusage, then the court had no jurisdiction to proceed against Walter Puterbaugh as an individual. The moment the appellant abandoned the purpose to hold him liable as executor and elected to proceed against him individually, that moment the court lost jurisdiction to render any judgment against him").

64. Tyler v. Stitt, 127 Wis. 379, 381, 106 NW 114 ("This is a simple claim against an estate for a debt supposed to be due from the estate. The defendant is defending that claim in his representative character as administrator only. The estate is the real defendant; if there is no debt owing from the estate there can be no recovery. If there be any estoppel or trust which can be invoked against Mr. Stitt, it affects him only as an individual and not as administrator. Being sued as administrator in a pure action at law, he cannot be held as an individual upon an entirely different cause of action in equity. The two causes of action could not be joined. . . . A fortiori one cannot be turned into the other").

tract as executor or administrator does not affect the rule,[68] and although he is named in the declaration or complaint as personal representative, this will be considered merely descriptio personæ, which will be treated as surplusage or as intended to show the nature and origin of his liability. It cannot affect the form of the judgment.[69] Accordingly a personal representative must be sued in his individual capacity on notes [70] or bonds [71] executed by him, on bills of exchange drawn [72] or drafts accepted [73] by him, or on contracts made by him for payment for services of an attorney.[74] He must be sued in his individual capacity for work and labor performed at his request in his representative capacity,[75] and he is liable individually for goods furnished at his request.[76] A personal representative cannot be sued as such, either for money had and received by him,[77] money lent to him,[78] or on an account stated of money due from him as executor or administrator.[79]

"Persons who have contracted with the executor are not authorized to pursue the course to enforce their contracts that is given by statute to parties who contract with the decedent. If the executor refuses to acknowledge and discharge his obligation, he may be sued personally on his contract, and, if compelled to disgorge, he may include the amount in his account current." [a] Reason for rule.—He has the title to the personal estate. He has no principal behind him for whom he can contract as agent. This is the policy of the law. The estate in the personalty is given, by the law, directly to the administrator. For the purpose of use and sale the title vests in him and he is held responsible as owner. As owner, he must account to the persons ultimately entitled to distribution and as owner he sells, disposes, and contracts as his judgment dictates. These considerations fix the liability for the debt in question upon the administrators personally, and not upon the estate. Ferrin v. Myrick, 41 N. Y. 315.

[a] Release of personal claim against representative. — Where an attorney for executors, after executing a release to them reciting that he would make no further personal claim against them for his services, but that any further claim should be made against the estate, brought an ordinary common-law action against the executors to recover a money judgment for his services, such action was unsustainable on the theory that its object was merely to liquidate plaintiff's claim in order finally to reach the estate, such not being the purport of the complaint, and for the further reason that any judgment in favor of plaintiff rendered therein would not furnish a criterion as to the executors' right to reimbursement from the estate or through the extent of such right. Brackett v. Ostrander, 126 App. Div. 529, 110 NYS 779.

[b] When representative refuses payment.—Code (1906) § 2131, providing that in annual and final settlements the administrator shall be entitled to credit for reasonable sums paid for services of an attorney in the management of the estate, gives a method by which an administrator may, with the approval of the chancery court, employ and pay an attorney for service rendered without a suit to establish the claim; but it has no reference to a claim which an attorney seeks to enforce over the administrator's protest, and to enforce such a claim resort must be had to an action at law or in equity. Murphy v. Harris, 93 Miss. 286, 48 S 232.

[c] A contrary view.—Williams v. Walker, 31 Ga. 195 (where one of two executors named in a will qualified and employed the services of an attorney in behalf of the estate, and he died, and the other executor subsequently qualified, the attorney should recover his fees in an action at law against the second executor in his representative capacity); Jackson v. Leech, 113 Mich. 391, 71 NW 846 (under a statute providing that an executor shall be allowed all the necessary expenses in the care, management, and settlement of the estate, and for his services such fees as the law provides together with all extra expenses, an executor may bind the estate for the payment of a reasonable compensation for the services of an attorney).

decisions, notwithstanding it is his duty to pay such expenses from the estate, an administrator or executor should be sued in his individual capacity on contracts made by him for funeral or burial expenses of decedent,[82] although there are decisions which seem to maintain the contrary view.[83]

"The appellant argues that claims for funeral expenses stand upon the same ground as claims for attorney's fees, brokers' commissions, or other demands arising under contracts made by the executor or administrator, and that, accordingly, a demand for such funeral expenses cannot form the basis of any action except one against the executor or administrator personally. We think this position cannot be upheld. Claims for funeral expenses are not necessarily founded upon contracts made by the personal representative. It is seemly and proper, indeed necessary, that decent burial should be given to the body of a deceased person within a very short period after death. Ordinarily, arrangements for such burial must be made, and expense incurred, before the appointment of an executor or administrator. An undertaker is justified in furnishing the necessary service upon the request of any one so related to the decedent as to exclude the idea of officious interference. The one ordering the burial may or may not be the same person who subsequently becomes executor or administrator. If, as in this case, the person alleged to have ordered the funeral does become executor or administrator, the liability, if any, of the estate is not affected one way or the other by such circumstance. The person contracting for the service may be individually liable therefor, but this liability depends upon his individual agreement, and not upon his subsequent representative character. The claim for funeral services is not, to be sure, a claim on a contract or debt of the decedent, existing before his death. Neither, as we have pointed out, is it a claim on a contract made after death by the personal representative as such. It is a demand of a peculiar nature, arising immediately upon death, but prior to the commencement of administration. It is properly chargeable, in some form of procedure, against the assets of the estate." Golden Gate Undertaking Co. v. Taylor, 168 Cal. 94, 98, 141 P 922, 52 LRANS 1152, AnnCas1915D 742.

[a] Under special statutory provisions.—Under a statute placing funeral expenses among debts to be first paid out of the estate and providing that an action for them may be brought against an executor, even within the six months which is generally allowed him to examine into the condition of the estate, an action will lie for such expenses against the executor in his representative capacity. maintained against a personal representative as such for malfeasance or misfeasance or for a tort;[91] but where a libel contained in a will was published by the probate thereof, it was held that the estate of the testator, and not the executor individually, was liable.[92]

[§ 1827] (2) Conversion or Detention of Property. If a personal representative takes property not belonging to the estate, he has no right to it in his representative capacity. Consequently, as a general rule, his refusal to restore it to the rightful owner renders him individually liable, and he cannot be sued in his representative capacity for his individual tort.[93] There is, however, authority for the view that a representative who, acting on behalf of the estate and claiming in his representative capacity, secured possession of and refuses to surrender property which in reality does not belong to the estate, may be held liable for the wrong in his representative, as well as in his individual, capacity.[94] It has also been held that, where one to whom property was given by a decedent surrendered it to the personal representative on demand, without disclaiming or making a gift or sale to the personal representative, the donee might waive the tort and bring suit in assumpsit for the value of the property against the representative in his individual or representative capacity.[95] Where the property of a third person has passed from the possession of decedent into the possession of his personal representative, the latter is liable in his individual capacity for the detention thereof,[96] but it is generally considered that under such circumstances he may also be held liable in his representative capacity,[97] although this has been de-

[b] Infringement of patent. — A suit cannot be maintained against the executors for infringement of a patent in the construction of a mausoleum in which the body of their decedent was placed, where it was contracted and paid for by them and others individually, and not as executors. C. E. Tayntor Granite Co. v. Goetchius, 171 Fed. 108, 111 [aff 183 Fed. 120, 105 CCA 420] ("I am of opinion that the proofs show that the executors of Goetchius did not build this mausoleum. They do not own it, nor does the estate of Mr. Goetchius own it. Neither the defendants, nor any of them, made any contract or did any act in respect of the mausoleum in question in his capacity as executor. This would be true, even if the edifice had been reared on private land; but it is alleged and proven to have been erected in a cemetery in the state of New York, and by the laws of this state a lot in such cemetery, when once used for purposes of interment, ceases to be property in the ordinary sense of the word. It can only be used for the further interment of persons of the kin of the original purchaser, in accordance with the rules of the cemetery and the provision of the deed of conveyance. Without the consent of the cemetery authorities, nothing can be erected thereon or removed therefrom. Since, therefore, the defendants did not put up this building, do not own it, cannot remove it, and have very obviously made no profit therefrom, and never will make any profit therefrom, I do not think that a bill in equity will lie").

The publication of this libel was made by the agent the executor, in literal pursuance of the authority given; that is to say, it was made by the probate of testator's will. It was of course the duty of the executor to probate this will, and for a suppression thereof criminal accountability would have followed. Smith v. Harrison, 2 Heisk (Tenn.) 230; Douglass v. Baber, 15 Lea 651. It is not a case, therefore, in which the agent, the executor, should be held to any liability, but if liability exists, the principal should be responsible. . . . By the grace of the law a man is allowed to control the disposition of property after his death and to do many other things by will. He is thus allowed to project his individuality, his grasp, and his desires, beyond the grave, and make them effective. If by will he breaches his contract, this executor and his estate are made to respond. If by will he commits a tort there seems to be no good reason why his executor and his estate should not likewise be held accountable. With the maxim, 'Actio personalis moritur cum persona,' out of the way, there is no good reason, and we have seen that this maxim does not touch this case").

"When goods are unlawfully detained by an administrator, who has nied.[98] Where a widow took charge of all her deceased husband's property, and continued to use and dispose of it as she pleased during her lifetime, her administrator could not be sued by her husband's administrator as for a conversion of such property in the absence of an identification of any of such property as coming into the hands of her administrator, but the remedy of the husband's administrator was by a proceeding in the probate court for the allowance of a demand against the widow's estate.[99] Under a statute providing that trespass or case may be maintained against a personal representative for the carrying away of goods by decedent, trover may be sustained against the personal representative as such, although the good never came into his hands.[1]

[§ 1828] d. Action for Accounting of Income from Property Held in Trust by Decedent. Where real estate came into the hands of an executor which was not properly assets, but which was held by his testatrix as a constructive trustee for the executor as an individual and others, and the executor received all the rents and profits after the death of his testatrix, he is liable to a personal judgment in a suit for accounting for the rents and profits.[2]

[§ 1829] e. Ejectment. Where an executor takes possession of real property held by his testator, which he is authorized by statute to do, ejectment may be brought against him in his representative capacity.[3] Where an administrator who is also the sole heir is in possession of lands of the decedent, ejectment is properly brought against him individually rather than as administrator.[4]

[§ 1830] C. Form of Action. Where a personal representative brings suit or is sued, the form of action is ordinarily the same as that by or against a person suing or sued in his own right. For injury to or conversion of property after decedent's death, the personal representative may maintain trover, replevin, detinue, or trespass;[5] and, when entitled to the possession of real property belonging to the estate, he may maintain such actions as unlawful retainer, ejectment, trespass to try title, or writ of entry.[6] In actions against personal representatives on simple contracts entered into by decedent debt will lie,[7] and this action also lies on an obligation of decedent that his executor shall pay after his death.[8] It cannot, however, be maintained by an administrator de bonis non, upon an unsatisfied judgment recovered by the original administrator as the remedy is by scire facias.[9] If rents are by statute made liable for claims against the estate, assumpsit and not an action on the administration bond is the proper remedy of a creditor.[10] A statutory action to recover a claim against the estate, if it is a demand for money, is an action at law, and the rejection of the claim does not change its character.[11] Where an action may be maintained in a court of law for a legacy, assumpsit,[12] debt,[13] or case [14] will lie. Assumpsit also lies against an executor by one entitled under the will to the rents and profits, where they are withheld by the executor.[15] For torts committed by decedent, any form of action which might have been maintained against him will be proper in actions against his representative based thereon, provided the action is one which survives.[16] Case is the proper remedy by decedent's widow for the refusal of the administrator to set apart for her the property to which she is entitled,[17] although if he has converted the property into money she may sue in assumpsit for money had and received.[18] Where the bailee of a special deposit of money dies without returning it, and the money cannot be identified, an action in the nature of conversion is the only come into possession of them from his intestate, in due course of administration, and claims title to them in the right of his intestate, a person seeking by replevin to recover them has his choice of action against the detainer personally, or of suing him in his representative capacity." Boyle v. Knauss, 81 N. J. L. 330, 335, 79 A 1025.

"This stock stood in the name of the decedent at the time of his death, and came into the hands of his executor as a part of his estate. Under such circumstances the more equitable rule is that if the executor or administrator applies to the use of the estate money or the proceeds of property belonging to a third person, he is liable in both his individual and representative capacity, and the injured party may elect whether he will hold him in the one capacity or the other. Respondents elected to pursue the executor in his representative capacity, as they had a right to do; but having followed that course, they can only take such judgment as the law authorizes in such cases." Collins v. Denny Clay Co., supra.

[a] Under a statute declaring that the action of trover shall survive for or against an executor or administrator, the representatives are subjected to that form of action in their representative capacity where a conversion had taken place in the lifetime of decedent. Nations v. Hawkins, 11 Ala. 859.

[b] Suit for possession or value of goods.—Where a testator has attempted to dispose of by will property which he held only as bailee, and his executor, as such, has taken possession of the property, and refused, on proper demand, to deliver it to the owner, the owner may maintain an action against the executor in his representative capacity for the possession of the goods or their value. Moran v. Morrill, 78 App. Div. 440, 80 NYS 120 [aff 177 N. Y. 563 mem, 69 NE 1127 mem].

[c] Where the representative has sold, as property of the estate, property belonging to a third person, an action for the value of such property is properly brought against him in his representative capacity. Schmitt v. Jacques, 26 Tex. Civ. A. 125, 62 SW 956.

[a] Property not becoming assets.—Where the remainder of the estate of a widow's husband at her death vested absolutely in trustees of his estate, it did not become assets in the hands of her executors, and an action was properly brought against them individually and not in their representative capacity to recover the same. Luscomb v. Fintzelberg, 162 Cal. 433, 123 P 247.

[b] Property loaned to decedent.—The act of a surviving husband in assuming dominion over articles loaned to his deceased wife and in refusing to restore them to the lender creates a cause of action against him individually, and not in his capacity as administrator of the deceased wife. remedy available against the executrix on her refusal to recognize the claim.[19] Statutes providing that, for the purposes of suit, joint contracts shall be deemed joint and several, and that the executors of a joint obligor shall be bound to the same extent as if the obligation were joint and several, do not take from the executors of a joint obligor a defense which existed at common law, but merely enable them to be sued at law, where otherwise they could be proceeded against only in equity, and are therefore applicable to an action brought against such executors, although enacted subsequent to the obligation sued upon.[20]

[§ 1831] D. Conditions Precedent—1. Actions by Representative—a. In General. An executor or administrator should obtain the authority of the court of probate to institute and conduct litigation in order to protect himself and preclude the questioning of his expenditures.[21] But the facts that an action by an administrator to foreclose a mortgage was begun without an order from the probate court, that the money due was not necessary for the payment of debts, and that one heir desired the mortgage to be set off to him, do not in any way affect the capacity of plaintiff to sue.[22] Where a sheriff was by statute made ex officio administrator, the fact that he did not personally authorize a suit brought in his name did not render the decree therein void for want of jurisdiction.[23]

[§ 1832] b. On Securities Deposited with Depositary. Where the statute provides that the surrogate may direct securities for the payment of money belonging to an estate to be deposited with a trust company, after which the administrator's bond may be fixed without regard to such securities, and that a security thus deposited shall not be withdrawn from the custody of the trust company, and no person other than the proper officer of the trust company shall receive or collect any of the principal or interest secured thereby, without an order of the surrogate, an action by the administrator on a note thus deposited with a trust company, and issuance of execution by him on the judgment therein recovered, all without order of the surrogate, are without right, and do not furnish a valid judgment and return of execution unsatisfied, necessary for a judgment creditors' action by the administrator.[24]

[§ 1833] c. To Set Aside Fraudulent Conveyance.[25] It is sometimes required by statute that the personal representative shall obtain leave of the court before suing to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance made by decedent in his lifetime.[26] Under a statute authorizing an executor or administrator to sue to recover property fraudulently conveyed by the decedent where there is a deficiency of assets, such a deficiency arising through the allowance of claims which will become a charge on the estate, authorizes the representative to institute proceedings to set aside such a conveyance without an order of the probate court or an application by creditors.[27] Where a statute, providing for the recovery by the personal representative of property fraudulently disposed of by a testator, requires that claims of creditors must be evidenced by a judgment, or must have been allowed by the representative, an approval of the claim by the judge will take the place of an allowance by the representative.[28]

[§ 1834] d. For Injury to or Conversion of Personalty. To entitle a personal representative to maintain an action for injury to or conversion of personal property whether in his individual or representative capacity, it is not necessary that he should have had actual possession thereof at the time the cause of action arose,[29] but such action may be maintained, although the injury or conversion occurred between the time of decedent's death and the granting of letters of administration.[30] The action is based on the representative's right of property, which draws after it the right to possession,[31] and the legal effect of granting letters is to vest in the representative the legal title to the personal property, which relates back to the time of the death of decedent.[32] An administrator may sue in his own right for the conversion of goods acquired after the death of the intestate.[33]

[§ 1835] 2. Actions against Representative—a. For Debts of Decedent—(1) Leave of Court to Sue. Where the statute makes leave of the probate court to sue the personal representative a condition precedent, an action against him cannot be maintained without procuring such permission.[34] It is not essential to the validity of the order granting permission that it should be made on petition and notice to the personal representative.[35] The application is addressed to the sound discretion of the court and will not be granted when it would be inequitable to do so.[36]

[§ 1836] (2) Presentation of Claim[37]—(a) Necessity for Presentation—aa. In General. Apart from any statutory requirements on the subject the presentation of a claim to the personal representative or the probate court is not a condition precedent to the commencement of an action against the personal representative upon such claim;[38] but in a number of jurisdictions statutes have been enacted establishing such a requirement and precluding any action against representatives on a claim which has not been presented for allowance.[39] The personal representative is not presumed to know what the claims against the estate are, and in a great majority of cases he cannot know until they are presented to him by the creditors,[40] and the object of statutes requiring presentation is to bring the claims to the knowledge of the representative in order that he may be able to judge in what manner the estate should be settled,[41] and for the purpose of affording him additional means of protecting the estate against spurious claims[42] and an opportunity to allow all valid claims against the estate and thereby avoid the cost of unnecessary litigation.[43]

[a] The presentation is the beginning of a legal prosecution to judgment. Hume v. Perry, (Tex. Civ. A.) 136 SW 594.

[b] In order to confer jurisdiction over the subject of the action a claim against the estate must be filed, placed upon the appearance docket, and, if not allowed, must be transferred to the issue docket; and, upon demurrer for want of jurisdiction, the record must show that such steps have been taken. Stanford v. Stanford, 42 Ind. 485. See also Ward v. Magaha, 71 Wash. 679, 129 P 395 (failure to present a claim against an estate to the executor or administrator, as required by Remington & B. Code § 1479, is not a mere matter of abatement, but the presentation is a fact essential to the cause of action). But compare Clayton v. Dinwoodey, 33 Utah 251, 93 P 723, 14 AnnCas 926 (presentation of a claim to the executors is not jurisdictional to an action thereon).

[e] A mere failure to apply for administration is not a "suspension" within Pub. St. (1901) c 191 §§ 2, 4, prohibiting suits against an administrator unless the demand is exhibited to, and suit is brought against, him within a specified time after grant of administration, excluding the time administration may have been suspended, the suspension contemplated being one caused by the death, resignation, removal, etc., of an original administrator upon a deceased debtor's estate within the period prescribed for presentation of claims or suing, and having no reference to a suspension of administration upon a deceased creditor's estate. Cummings v. Farnham, 75 N. H. 135, 71 A 632.

[f] Contingent claim.—Where, under the statute, the probate court may by order fix the time within which claims may be presented, and may allow such claims to be presented after such time and within eighteen months after notice of its order, actions on claims, which are so contingent that they are not susceptible of proof within the time limited, but which became absolute a sufficient length of time before the expiration of the eighteen months to give the creditors an opportunity to present their claims within eighteen months, are barred, unless the claims are presented, and the cause shown within that time. Schurmeier v. Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co., 137 Fed. 42, 69 CCA 22.

[g] After exhibition of the claim (1) an action may be maintained for the recovery of the amount of the demand as a common-law action in any court having jurisdiction of the amount involved. presentation has been held the same in chancery as at law.[44]

[§ 1837] bb. Applications of Rule. The statutory requirement of presentation[45] has been held to apply to claims evidenced by judgment as well as other demands,[46] and to joint actions against personal representatives and devisees on claims due from the estate.[47] Among claims which it has been held necessary to present as a condition precedent to any action thereon may be mentioned claims on contract generally,[48] a claim for services rendered to decedent,[49] a claim for fraud of decedent,[50] and a claim for damages for the obstruction of a right of way.[51] It sometimes happens, however, that the statute is applicable only to claims for money,[52] and has no application where the demand is for uncertain or unliquidated damages or for land.[53]

The requirement has been held not to apply to demands against a personal representative arising after the grant of administration,[54] to proceedings by a judgment creditor to subject to the payment of his judgment property fraudulently conveyed by decedent,[55] to actions brought against the debtor in his lifetime and revived against the representative,[56] to an action to have plaintiff adjudged the owner of land under an agreement by decedent giving plaintiff the property owned by decedent at death for caring for him,[57] to actions brought to correct errors made in a settlement with decedent,[58] to actions of replevin,[59] to claims in which the amount of the liability could not have been determined by the representative,[60] to claims based on tort,[61] to a claim for funeral expenses,[62] to an action by the assignee of a life policy, the administratrix of the insured's estate having been made a party,[63] or in other cases where it appears that no reason or necessity exists for the presentation of the claim,[64] as where the executor sells property in suit which by the terms of the will is reserved to the widow and children and by statute expressly de-

[a] Illustrations.—(1) Where defendant's testator executed two notes to plaintiff, with a contract annexed which recited the issuance of certain stock to him (plaintiff), and provided that plaintiff would accept a certain sum, if tendered to him by testator within six months, and assign the stock to testator, or return the notes to him to be canceled, but providing that plaintiff should not demand payment of the notes when due unless he transferred the stock to testator or his representative, and testator had the stock in his possession at his death for the purpose of selling it, it was held, in an action against his administratrix on the notes, that she could not object that plaintiff did not present his claim and offer to transfer the stock to the estate in accordance with the contract, she being in possession of it, and refusing to produce it at trial for formal transfer to herself. Dickson v. Eames, 134 Mo. A. 373, 114 SW 574. (2) Where the seller of land scrip gave a note, secured by a deed of trust on lands, to the buyer to secure him in case the scrip proved invalid, as it afterward did, and the buyer pledged some of the scrip to a bank to secure his own note, it was held that the bank, without presenting the note as a claim against the maker's estate, and after the running of the two year statute of limitations, could sue to recover its share of the proceeds of the foreclosure of the deed of trust by the executor. Holland Banking Co. v. See, (Mo. A.) 130 SW 354. (3) Where, in an action by a stockholder's executor to recover dividends, the stockholder's widow was substituted as defendant and set up a claim to the dividends under a pledge of the stock to her to secure the payment of notes, the widow's rights were exactly the same as though she was suing the corporation, and nonpresentation of the notes cleared not to be assets in the personal representative's hands.[65] An action to quiet title against certain fraudulent conveyances may be brought against the executors of the perpetrators of the fraud, without the claim being presented to them within one year after their appointment, where the fraud was not discovered until after the expiration of that time.[66]

Lien claims. It is very generally held that these statutes have no application where the claim is in relation to real estate and no presentation or demand is necessary in actions to foreclose mortgages, and the only effect of failure to present the claim for allowance would be to prevent a recovery of any deficiency that might remain after exhaustion of the mortgaged property, out of the testator's other estate.[67] The same rule applies to vendors' liens,[68] and a chattel mortgage may be foreclosed, although the claim secured thereby was not presented.[69]

Claims arising out of trust relations. Presentation of the claim is not a condition precedent to an action to declare a trust,[70] or to recover money or property identified as that held by decedent in trust,[71] but an action to recover trust money converted by the trustee to his own use, the identity of which cannot be traced, is an action on a claim against the estate, and is not maintainable unless a claim therefor has been presented to the administrator for approval.[72]

If there are no assets in the hands of the representative, a creditor is not, it has been held, obliged to present his claim before bringing suit to subject real estate of decedent to the payment of debts.[73]

Interest. Failure to make demand does not deprive claimant of the right to interest where there was no administrator of whom demand could be made.[74]

Independent executors. Where the estate is being administered by an independent executor free from the control of the court, presentation of a claim is not a condition precedent to an action thereon against him.[75]

[§ 1838] (b) Effect of Knowledge of Representative. It has been held that the representative's knowledge of the existence of a claim, no matter how full, does not dispense with the necessity of complying with the statutory requirement of presentation as a condition precedent to any action thereon.[76]

[§ 1839] (c) By Whom Claim Presented. It has been held that the claim may be presented either by plaintiff or by his agent or attorney,[77] but there is also authority for the view that the claim must be presented by the claimant himself.[78]

[§ 1840] (d) Sufficiency of Presentation. Claims must be presented as required by statute,[79] and they should be presented to the executor or administrator personally.[80] The claim presented need not be signed by the party making it and the demand of payment need not be in writing, although the claim must be.[81] Any presentment which gives as a claim against the estate did not prejudice her rights. Savings Union Bank v. Crowley, 176 Cal. 543, 169 P 67. (4) Where land conveyed by decedent was condemned by a municipality, and the condemnation money placed in the hands of a stakeholder pending a determination of the rights of the parties, presentation of a claim to the executor was not a condition prerequisite to the commencement of suit to recover such money. Watts v. Lawrence, (Wyo.) 185 P 719. (5) Laborers employed by a contractor, who completed the contract after decedent's death and presented his claim to the executor may have the amount of their claims included in a personal judgment rendered in the contractor's favor, although they did not present their claims, where the contractor admits that he should pay them out of the amount claimed by him. As well said in Huffman v. Moore, 101 Ky. 288, 41 SW 292, 19 KyL 461 'Indeed, the right to bring an action such as this is expressly given to a creditor by section 428, Civil Code Prac. The decease of one party leaves all such knowledge in the breast of a single individual, and that one the claimant. [a] Presentation to agent.—The reception of the notice and demand required by an agent or attorney of an administrator is not incident to a general appointment or employment to assist in settling an estate; nor will such an appointment relieve claimants from any duty incumbent upon them by force of the statute. Rawson v. Knight, 71 Me. 99.

81. Millett v. Millett, 72 Me. 117.

the personal representative to understand the nature and amount of the claim will be sufficient,[82] and it is not necessary to present the agreement on which the claim is founded.[83] It has been held that the demand must be such that the personal representative, if he wishes to pay, may do so at once and a demand for payment by letter is insufficient;[84] but it has also been held a sufficient exhibition of a claim founded on a note to deliver to the representative a verbatim copy of the note to which is attached the statutory affidavit of the justness of the claim.[85] The claimant can recover only on the claim which was presented to the personal representative,[86] and not on a cause of action not included in the claim,[87] but the fact that the proof does not establish the claim upon the precise theory stated in the claim filed will not prevent a recovery thereon.[88] So also the claimant may sue for an amount less than his rejected claim, if it is shown to be part of the claim presented,[89] and it has also been held that the presentation of a claim for a designated amount will not necessarily prevent a recovery for a greater amount.[90] An erasure of the names of indorsers on a note after presentment does not make an action thereon one for a different claim than the one presented,[91] and where claimant has presented a note, which proves invalid because of decedent's insanity, claimant may recover on a valid claim which was the basis of the note.[92]

[§ 1841] (e) Cure or Waiver of Nonpresentation. Presentment and allowance of a demand after suit brought does not cure the failure to present before bringing suit.[93] It is usually considered that presentment may be waived,[94] and is waived where the administrator joins issue and goes to trial on the validity of the claim without objection,[95] or files a demurrer.[96] So also the exhibition and demand of payment, required by statute, before action against an administrator, is sufficiently made,

Wash.—Brownfield v. Holland, 63 Wash. 86, 114 P 890.

[a] Exhibition held sufficient.—Pending suit for contribution by one of two indorsers of accommodation notes, defendant died. Plaintiff's attorney orally called the attention of defendant's administrator to the fact that plaintiff had a claim against the estate, showed him the notes, and told him of the suits. The administrator was served with a writ of scire facias, and in response thereto entered his appearance. It was held that there was a sufficient exhibition of the claim to the administrator. Pratt v. Stoner, 78 Conn. 310, 61 A 1009.

[b] Title of claim.—Where the title to a claim against a deceased lessee was: "To the estate of [name of decedent] and [name of surviving lessee] . . . debtor to" lessor, and the verification of the claim conformed to the statute, but the executor rejected the claim, such claim was sufficiently presented to the executors to support an action thereon. Brownfield v. Holland, 63 Wash. 86, 114 P 890.

[c] Presenting a copy of a note or other written instrument will be sufficient unless the representative requires the original to be produced. Marshall v. Perkins, 72 Me. 343; Tebbetts v. Tilton, 31 N. H. 273; Mathes v. Jackson, 7 N. H. 259.

[d] The presentment of an account, including articles furnished for decedent's burial and articles sold and delivered to him in his lifetime, without showing the amount due for the funeral, is not sufficient as a demand for payment of the funeral expenses. Ward v. Jones, 44 N. C. 127.

[e] Failure to state nature of claim.—A written claim for "balance due Jan. 1, 1904 $2265.50," does not exhibit the nature of the claim as required by the statute. Hurley v. Farnsworth, 107 Me. 306, 78 A 291.

[a] Action held to be on claim presented.—Where a claim was rejected when acted upon by the administrator because it appeared from its face that it was then barred by limitations, the notice of claim not stating intestate's absence from the state for six months, which would take it out of the statute, a subsequent action on the rejected claim was on the claim presented, although the complaint alleged intestate's absence in order to take the claim out of the statute. 88. Taber v. Zehner, 47 Ind. A. 165, 93 NE 1035.

[a] Illustration.—A claim filed against an estate stated that claimant and her child were entitled to a certain legacy, and that she intrusted decedent, her nephew and a banker, in whose honesty and business ability she had great confidence, with the collection of such legacy, and that he collected it for claimant's use and benefit and with the exception of a part thereof never paid it to her, but retained it in his possession until his death; that on account of the confidential relationship between claimant and decedent, and of his superior knowledge in business affairs, and ability to loan and manage the fund, claimant permitted him to retain it, under an agreement that he would keep it loaned out, and that decedent, in retaining and accepting said fund, accepted such trust and agreed to account to claimant therefor, and that claimant at various times demanded a settlement of him, but he always deferred a settlement through a plausible excuse until he died. It was held that the claim was sufficient to authorize proof to support it in an action thereon, within Burns Annot. [a] Decree barring claims.—In an action at law on a claim, to which has been pleaded a decree of the surrogate barring all the claims not duly verified and presented within the time specified by notice for presenting claims, plaintiff cannot show facts constituting an estoppel of the executrix to interpose such decree as a defense, or that the presentation of plaintiff's claim under oath was waived But plaintiff may maintain a suit in equity to restrain such defense by showing waiver of verification of the claim which was presented before such decree. Seymour v. Goodwin, 68 N. J. Eq. 189, 59 A 93 [aff 69 N. J. Eq. 833, 66 A 1134].

[b] Waiver by attorney.—"The retainer of an attorney in a law suit brought against an administratrix does not give him any implied authority to waive the proper prosecution of the claim, according to law. The statute contains no provision which authorizes the administratrix to waive the filing of the claim as provided by the statute above cited." Andrews v. O'Reilly, 34 R. I. 256, 259, 83 A 119.

or waived, where the administrator calls on the claimant's attorney and, after the claim is fully explained, states he will not pay, and that it would do no good to make a written statement.[97] There is, however, authority for the view that the statutory requirement of presentation as a condition precedent to action on a claim cannot be waived by the representative.[98] Where an executor or administrator has received a written claim that does not exhibit the nature of the claim, he need not call attention to the defect, and his omission to do so is not a waiver of his right to be informed of the nature of the claim, nor is his statement that he will not pay a wrong bill evidence of waiver.[99] An admission of the representative that the claim sued on was exhibited is equivalent to proof of exhibition.[1]

Equitable relief to a creditor who has, without culpable negligence, failed to present his claim in time is sometimes authorized by statute.[2]

[§ 1842] (3) Verification of Claims—(a) Necessity. The statutes in some jurisdictions make it a condition precedent to a suit against an executor or administrator on a claim against the estate that the claim be authenticated by affidavit,[3] or that an affidavit of the justice of the demand be made.[4] Such a requirement has been held to apply to a complainant who has commenced his action but has not recovered judgment before the death of his debtor,[5] and to a claim against an estate pleaded as a set-off or counterclaim,[6] but not to claims against the representative,[7] or in an action against an executor on a compromise made with plaintiff.[8] It has been held that a statute requiring authentication of claims is designed merely for the protection of the personal representative and lack of verification does not affect the creditor's right to sue.[9]

[§ 1843] (b) Time for Verification. Where the verification of the claim is a prerequisite to the right to bring an action thereon, an affidavit made after the commencement of the action is insufficient.[10]

[§ 1844] (c) Sufficiency. It is not necessary that the affidavit shall literally follow the language of the statute which provides what it shall contain.[11] So an affidavit in an action on a count for services rendered which follows substantially the language of the statute, states sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action, shows an employment, rendition of services, their value, and decedent's agreement to pay, is a sufficient verification of the demand.[12] But an affidavit wholly failing to state, as required by statute, that there are no offsets against the claim, is fatally defective.[13] Where the statute does not require the verification to state either the date or amount of the note or other demand, the fact that the affidavit states a wrong date is not a fatal variance.[14]

An affidavit of a third person to prove an account against the estate of a decedent which states that the account "is just and true as he verily believes" is insufficient.[15]

An affidavit made before an officer not having authority to take affidavits will be inoperative.[16]

[§ 1845] (d) Waiver of Verification or Defects in Verification. It has been held that the statutory requirement of verification cannot be waived, and if the affidavit made is defective, advantage may be taken of it at any time before final judgment,[17] but it has also been asserted that defendant does not waive his right to object to the sufficiency of the affidavit by answering without objection.[18] While it has been held that want of verification can be taken advantage of only before or at the time of filing the answer,[19] and that a failure to verify the demand is waived by appearance and answer to the merits,[20] it has also been laid down that, where the authentication of a claim is a prerequisite to the right of action against the administrator or executor, the failure to authenticate may be taken advantage of at any time before trial and final judgment.[21] Where, in an action brought in the lifetime of decedent and after his death revived against his administrator, plaintiff,

[a] Reason for rule.—"A personal representative, after negligently failing to avail himself of the protection designed by the statute in requiring demand of payment and verification of the claim, and suffering defeat in a trial on the merits in the court below, should, on appeal, in all fairness, be estopped by such negligence from making complaint of the want of such demand and proof." Harding v. Bullard, 172 Ky. 417, 423, 189 SW 242.

[b] The proper practice is for the personal representative to file an affidavit showing that no demand has been made on him before suit brought accompanied by an affidavit required by the statute and thereupon a rule should be awarded against plaintiff to show cause why his petition should not be dismissed. Tichenor v. Wood, 70 SW 637, 24 KyL 1109.

without having verified his demand, recovers a verdict and the court renders a judgment thereon against the administrator, such judgment will be reversed with directions to the court below to set it aside, but to render it again upon the necessary affidavit being made subject to any credits, offsets, or discounts disclosed in the affidavit;[22] and if no such affidavit shall be filed within a reasonable time then to set aside the verdict and dismiss the action.[23]

[§ 1846] (4) Action on Claim by Probate Court. It is not ordinarily a condition precedent to an action on a claim against the estate that it should have been passed on by the probate court,[24] but it has been held that there can be no recovery for legal services rendered to an executor until there has been an allowance therefor against the estate.[25]

[§ 1847] (5) Rejection or Disallowance of Claim. Under some statutes it is essential to the right to bring suit on a claim against the estate that it should have been rejected or disallowed when presented.[26] It is, however, sufficient that the claim has been unequivocally rejected, and a formal indorsement of rejection on the claim is not essential.[27] It has been held that, where the estate has been reported insolvent, an action cannot be brought on a rejected claim until the commissioners have reported.[28]

[§ 1848] (6) Inability to Recover against Co-obligor. The rule, that in an action against the personal representative of a deceased joint debtor it must be alleged and proved that the debt cannot be collected against the surviving joint debtors, has no application to an action on an undertaking, the obligation of which is joint and several.[29]

[§ 1849] b. To Recover Legacies. No action at law can be maintained for the recovery of a legacy unless the will has been regularly admitted to probate,[30] and in some jurisdictions it is essential that the legatee should, before bringing action, give a refunding bond.[31] It is also a condition to the right of recovery at law that sufficient assets have come into defendant's hands,[32] and that there are no debts for which the legacy could be made liable.[33] The general rule is that to authorize a recovery of a legacy in an action at law a demand therefor must be made[34] by someone having authority to receive and to discharge the legacy,[35] unless such demand is waived, as may be done.[36] No decree of the probate court in favor of the legatee is necessary to enable him to maintain an action for his legacy,[37] nor is it necessary that there should be an order that the legacy be paid to plaintiff or into court.[38] To authorize a bill in equity to recover a legacy it is not necessary that there should have been a settlement of the estate,[39] that the claim should have been first established against the executor, at law,[40] or that there should have been an order in the probate court for its payment;[41] and if the purpose of the bill is merely to establish the validity of the bequest and not to obtain possession of a particular thing bequeathed, a demand for the particular legacy is not a condition precedent to the bringing of a suit.[42]

can under any circumstances be maintained for the recovery of a distributive share of decedent's estate, except after a decree of distribution has been rendered.[45] That a demand and a refusal to pay is a condition precedent to the right of a distributee to maintain an action at law for his distributive share as settled by the decree of distribution has been both asserted[46] and denied.[47]

[§ 1851] d. To Have Deed Declared a Mortgage and Redeem. A bill against one as administratrix to have a deed absolute in form declared a mortgage, and to redeem therefrom, may be maintained, without a prior trial in the probate court of the issue whether the deed belonged to defendant individually as claimed by her, or as administratrix, as asserted by plaintiff, such issue being triable in such suit, the bill being amended to make the administratrix a defendant in her individual capacity, although plaintiff and defendant are the only persons, except creditors, interested in the estate, and one of the things conveyed was personal property coming to plaintiff as one of the two persons interested in the estate.[48]

[§ 1852] e. To Recover Money Paid on Unfulfilled Contract of Sale. Where a purchaser has demanded and his vendor has refused to convey land according to contract, and the vendor subsequently died, it is not necessary for the purchaser to demand a conveyance from the vendor's executor before suing the executor for money paid on the contract.[49]

[§ 1853] f. To Recover from Estate of Husband for Debts of Wife. A suit at law cannot be maintained against the executor of a deceased husband to enforce payment of his wife's just debts, by virtue of a provision of the husband's will creating an estate in remainder in his daughter after the satisfaction of the just debts of his wife; but such executor may require the just debts of the wife to be first established by a suit against her executor.[50]

[§ 1854] g. To Recover Trust Funds Converted by Decedent. Where a guardian converted his wards' funds and did not account therefor during his lifetime, he having lived for a long period after his wards reached majority, the wards were not required to sue his executors for an accounting before suing them to recover the funds converted.[51]

[§ 1855] E. Defenses—1. Actions by Personal Representatives—a. In General. In an action by an administrator to recover a debt due the estate, it is no defense that the coadministrator directed defendant not to pay it to plaintiff,[52] nor is it any defense that the debtor has made payment to a foreign administrator.[53] A recovery by heirs is a good defense to a suit by an administrator for their benefit where there are no debts due or owing by decedent.[54] In an action to set aside decedent's conveyances in fraud of creditors, it is no defense that the creditors' claims have been assigned to the administrator who brings the action,[55] nor, where an administrator de bonis non sues to set aside a fraudulent conveyance by decedent in order to make good a deficiency of assets, is it any defense that there would have been no deficiency if the executor had accounted for personalty coming into his possession, or if his bondsman had been sued for his failure to do so.[56] In an action for the recovery of property belonging to the estate, defendant cannot set up as a defense that the estate owes him money.[57] In an action on a note due decedent, it is not a defense that the note was deposited with a trust company by order of court and was produced therefrom only for the purpose of the action.[58] The fact that an administrator as an attorney at law has received from defendant a note for collection, the proceeds of which are to be applied to the payment of a debt due the intestate's estate, is no defense to a bill filed by the administrator to enforce a vendor's lien reserved as security for such debt.[59] When sued on a note payable to decedent, the surety of the maker, who was insolvent, may insist on the application of a distributive share of the payee's estate, coming to the maker in discharge of the note.[60] An administrator is not estopped from bringing suit for an accounting because of delay occasioned by misapprehension of the validity of the contract between decedent and defendant, where such delay was not prejudicial to defendant.[61] Where an administrator of a tenant sues for an irregularity committed by the landlord in carrying out a lawful distress levied after the tenant's death, the mere insolvency of the tenant's estate is immaterial where there has been no decree of insolvency.[62] Where, after the insured in a life policy had been induced to assign it to a woman through her fraud, participated in by her husband, she died, and insured sued to set aside the transfer, but he died, the husband being his executor and sole legatee, it was held, in the action continued by the executor, that plaintiff was not precluded from maintaining the action because of his participation in the fraud, in the absence of a showing by defendant that there were no debts, so as to render plaintiff the only one benefiting by a recovery by him.[63] Where a corporation's charter provided that stock held by a member who died should vest in the corporation at a valuation fixed by its by-laws, it was no defense, in an action by his personal representative for this value, that the deceased member had rendered himself liable to a forfeiture of certain dividends.[64] The existence of a will which has not been offered for probate is no defense to an action by an administrator for an accounting as to property in the hands of defendant, who stood in a fiduciary relation to decedent.[65] Even if the administrator is entitled to sue for property delivered by decedent in his lifetime to a person in trust to pay to certain designated beneficiaries, it is a sufficient defense, where no rights of creditors or third persons are involved, that defendant had made payment and accounted to the persons who would ultimately be entitled to receive fund or the property.[66] If one who assigns property to another for sale subsequently sues for the proceeds as administrator of one deceased, defendant cannot set up that he may be required to pay again to plaintiff personally, since plaintiff is bound by his judicial admissions as to the ownership of the proceeds.[67] Defendant in an action by an administrator de bonis non may take advantage of fraud in the contract made by the original administrator,[68] and an equity growing out of a debt sought to be enforced by a special administrator may be set up against him.[69] The failure of the surety on an administrator's bond to enforce an agreement of indemnity given by him does not estop a second administrator from proceeding against a bank which participated by negligence in the first administrator's embezzlement of funds of the estate.[70]

[§ 1856] b. Want of Representative Capacity.[71] It may be pleaded as a defense in an action by an executor that his letters testamentary have been revoked,[72] but where letters of administration granted in another state where decedent was domiciled are revoked, such revocation does not affect ancillary letters which have been in the meantime taken out in the jurisdiction where the action is brought, nor is an action previously brought by such administrator on behalf of the estate abated by such revocation.[73] A stranger to the estate who is sued by an administrator cannot object to plaintiff's capacity to sue on the ground of failure of the court to give preference in appointment as administrator to the wife or next of kin of the decedent, as required by statute.[74] Where a suit to foreclose a mortgage was commenced by persons claiming to be administrators, the objection that they are not such cannot be sustained if they have obtained a grant of administration before the objection is passed on;[75] but it has been held a good defense to a bill in equity by an administrator that he had not taken out letters of administration in the state before filing the bill.[76] Want of administrative capacity cannot be pleaded in an action on a contract made with plaintiff as administrator since he may sue thereon in his individual capacity,[77] and one who had received the benefit of a contract made by him with an executor or administrator cannot set up that the contract is of such a character that the representative had no authority to make it.[78] The objection that a plaintiff has no right to sue in a representative capacity may be waived by defendant's admissions.[79] Lack of jurisdiction of the probate court to make an appointment as administrator may be set up as a defense in an action by such administrator.[80]

[§ 1857] 2. Actions against Personal Representative—a. Duty to Interpose.[81] It is the duty of a personal representative to defend a suit against the estate, even though it is brought by a distributee,[82] and it has been said that, where one attempts to establish a claim as a creditor, the representative must interpose every available defense.[83]

[§ 1858] b. Want of Representative Capacity. One who is not a personal representatitve may set up this fact as a defense to an action against him as such,[84] unless he has done some act which will estop him to deny his representative capacity.[85] He may also plead, in bar of the further maintenance of an action against him in his representative capacity, a revocation of his letters[86] or that he has been removed from office.[87] It is not, however, a good plea in bar that the representative has resigned his trust, unless it is further alleged either that he has administered the assets that came into his hands, or that he delivered them to his successor;[88] and even a discharge on final settlement cannot be pleaded in bar to an action for a debt not barred by the statute of limitations at the time of final settlement.[89]

[§ 1859] c. Disability of Decedent. The existence of a disability, such as the infancy[90] or coverture[91] of decedent is a good defense by the personal representative in an action against him on contracts made by his testator or intestate. This is true, although the representative may have sold, as part of the estate, the property so acquired by decedent,[92] and the rule applies where plaintiff elects to waive a conversion by decedent and sue in contract.[93]

[§ 1860] d. Fraud Participated in by Decedent. A personal representative cannot set up as a defense to a claim against the estate that the claim arises out of a gift[94] or conveyance[95] by decedent which is in fraud of creditors, for, although such gift or conveyance may be void as to creditors, it is nevertheless good as between the parties, and the personal representative cannot set up a defense which would not have been available to decedent;[96] and one cannot complain of a wrong done by himself, or of another's wrong in which he participated.[97] So also an administrator sued on a judgment against decedent cannot set up as a defense that the judgment was obtained by collusion between plaintiff and decedent.[98]

[§ 1861] e. Insolvency of Estate. While it is a good plea puis darrein continuance that an estate has been represented insolvent pending an action against it,[99] a plea that the estate is insolvent is not good in bar, since the estate may be able to pay a portion of the debts.[1]

[§ 1862] f. Plene Administravit.[2] Plene administravit and want of assets is a good defense in an action on a claim brought several years after settlement of the administration account after having had previous notice of the claim.[3] The administratrix of a deceased guardian has been held not liable for the guardian's alleged default, where suit to enforce such liability was not commenced until five years after she had administered the guardian's estate according to the local law, had accounted for all property which she had received, and had been discharged from her trust, the correctness of her accounts not being assailed.[4] A plea by an administrator that he had fully administered, except as to goods and chattels to a certain amount not sufficient to satisfy a judgment recovered against him as such, does not bar a recovery.[5] That the estate has been fully settled and the lands apportioned is no defense to an action against the administrator by decedent's covenantee for a breach of a covenant of warranty against encumbrances.[6]

[§ 1863] g. Defenses in Individual and Representative Capacity. An administrator cannot set up an estoppel in his favor in his individual capacity against a claim against the estate,[7] nor is it a defense to a suit against him in his representative capacity that there is an action pending on the same claim against him in his individual capacity.[8] Where, however, one is sued both individually and as executor, he may set up a defense in either capacity.[9]

[§ 1864] h. Actions for Legacies or Distributive Shares. Where the assets are sufficient, it is no defense to a suit for a legacy that the estate has been partitioned among the heirs or other legatees,[10] or that debts have not been paid;[11] but lack of sufficient assets may be a defense pro tanto to an action for a legacy.[12] Plene administravit is not a good defense if several judgments are pleaded by the administrator and plaintiff falsifies any of them,[13] or where a legislative enactment was necessary to enable the legatee to receive a bequest and the legislature was not in session between the time of decedent's death and the time of final settlement.[14] It is not a defense that creditors enjoined an agent to receive legacies from a foreign executor under an appointment by the legatees from paying so much of the money as would be sufficient to satisfy their claims.[15] It is no defense to an action for a distributive share, that subsequent to a settlement of his account in the probate court charging himself with assets, a portion of the assets were subsequently recovered from the administrator in an adverse suit of which the distributees had notice.[16] The personal representative cannot, after final accounting, set up as a defense to an action for a distributive share that a mistake had occurred in the course of the settlement,[17] nor is a judgment for he shows that he took such care of it as a man of prudence would have taken of his own estate, or that his successor went into possession of the testator's lands under the provisions of the will, and that they were of value sufficient to pay plaintiff's demand).

17. Singleton v. Garrett, 23 Miss. 195 (if this could be done there would be no use in a final decree). But compare Cherry v. Belcher, 5 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 133 (where administrators are sued in chancery by a distributee to compel the payment of a distributive share, they are not precluded by the fact that the orphans' court had previously by a distributive share, void for want of jurisdiction, a defense to such action.[18] In an action for a distributive share it may be set up as a defense that part of the funds had been lost without the administrator's negligence;[19] that a part of the estate is claimed by one of defendants as individual property, and that another part is subject to a trust,[20] or that the claimant's share has been paid to his regularly appointed guardian.[21] Where an assignment of one's interest in the estate is executed for a valid consideration, before the estate is settled, it constitutes a defense to an action by the assignor to recover for his own use the share adjudged by the court to be due him as distributee.[22]

[§ 1865] i. Miscellaneous. An administrator may maintain a plea in abatement seasonably pleaded as well as a plea in bar.[23] To an action on a note made by decedent defendant may plead a usurious consideration,[24] or non est factum.[25] A plea which sets up ownership in the administrator as such is a good defense to an action against him for conversion of property.[26] A void judgment in favor of a creditor against a personal representative is no defense to a subsequent suit by the creditor to recover the amount of his claim against the estate.[27] If a reason for rejecting the claim is indorsed thereon, the representative cannot plead in abatement of a suit thereon any other reason which goes merely to the sufficiency of the presentation for allowance.[28] The personal representative cannot allege his own illegal acts in bar of the action of creditors against him.[29] A receipt given decedent may be set up in defense of an award on the claim for which the receipt was given.[30] Where decedent representing himself as agent of another sold his property and converted the proceeds, the personal representative is estopped to set up title in a third person.[31] The settlement of an executor's account in the probate court is no bar, it seems, to a suit for malfeasance and waste.[32] Where a mortgagor defrauded of the surplus on foreclosure agreed to pay her attorney a sum not to exceed a specified per cent of any amount that he could recover, and on her death he continued the action for recovery as her representative, such agreement could not affect the equity of his cause, as the orphans' court had power to limit his compensation if injustice should appear.[33] In an action by a son of decedent against his executor for breach of a contract of the father to convey land to him, the executor may plead the son's election to take under the will instead of under the contract.[34] If an administrator is sued by a stranger for the recovery of land, proof of title in decedent is a good defense, although the administration is void.[35] In an action against an administrator de bonis non on a debt properly incurred by the former administrator in management of the estate, it is not material that the former administrator failed to include such claim in the final account rendered to his successor.[36] In an action against an administrator, it appeared that defendant's intestate and plaintiff agreed that the profits and accounts then outstanding and to accrue until a certain date on the business of an incorporated company, the capital stock of which was principally owned by them, should belong to them in equal parts; that the profits consisted largely of accounts due from various parties; that after defendant's appointment as administrator some of the accounts were paid to him, and plaintiff collected of such accounts a certain specified sum, and laid claim to a certain sum, which according to the terms of the contract and the respective sums collected, it appeared defendant was owing plaintiff; it was held that whether the accounts collected were partnership accounts would be immaterial; for, if the accounts collected were partnership funds, defendant had no right to them either in his representative or individual capacity, and, if there was no partnership, by collecting in either capacity more than the share belonging to intestate under the contract, defendant received money which should have been paid to plaintiff.[37]

[§ 1866] F. Set-Off or Counterclaim—1. Actions by Personal Representatives—a. In General. As a general rule, a person who is sued by an executor or administrator may assert a set-off or counterclaim,[38] and where an action by an executor

[a] Illustrations.—(1) Where defendant was indebted to decedent on a note secured by a mortgage, and during decedent's lifetime defendant, while acting as her agent, performed services and advanced money for her benefit, for which he was entitled to reimbursement, and there was evidence that both parties contemplated that defendant's claim for services and advances should be credited on his indebtedness, defendant was entitled to set off such claim against the mortgage debt in a suit by decedent's administratrix to foreclose the mortgage. Printy v. Cahill, 235 Ill. 534, 85 NE 753 [rev 138 Ill. A. 600]. (2) Where, as partial consideration for a note, the payee agreed to perform personal services and died before the services had been rendered, in an action by his estate on the note, the maker might counterclaim for the difference between the consideration for the services and what it would cost to procure the services of another equally competent. Mendelhall v. Davis, 52 Wash. 169, 100 P 336, 21 LRANS 914, 17 AnnCas 179. (3) Where an executor as such by agreement with a stockbroker turned over to the latter funds of the estate for the purpose of dealing in stocks, which, on equitable principles, is an unlawful investment, the parties are not joint tort-feasors, in the sense that they have violated the law, there being no question of bad faith involved and on a note is dismissed as to one of the defendants, credits claimed by the other defendant for labor and expenses are the proper subject of set-off.[39] But where, in an action against a surviving husband by the administrator of the wife to recover on a note executed by the husband to the wife, the court could not ascertain the amount of the surplus personal estate left by the wife, it could not allow the husband a credit in the judgment in favor of the administrator of one half of the amount of the note, or allow a set-off for the value of personal property belonging to the estate, and wrongfully converted by the brothers and sisters of the deceased wife.[40]

[§ 1867] b. Mutuality of Demands. In order to warrant a set-off or counterclaim in an action by an executor or administrator, the debts must be mutual, and the principle of mutuality requires not only that the debts should be due to and from the same person, but also to and from the same person in the same capacity.[41] It has been considered, however, that the rule of mutuality is not always controlling, but may be departed from where it appears that permitting the set-off cannot embarrass the administration or prejudice the rights of other persons interested in the assets.[42] Where an administrator suing as such is insolvent, and a portion of the recovery will belong to him in his individual capacity, defendant may claim as in the nature of a set-off a demand in his favor against plaintiff in his individual capacity.[43]

[§ 1868] c. Particular Demands—(1) Debts Due in Decedent's Lifetime against Causes of Action Accruing after His Death. In an action on a cause of action accruing after decedent's death defendant cannot set off a debt due from the intestate in his lifetime.[44] The rule is the same whether the action is brought by the personal representative no positive law violated, and a cash payment made by the stockbroker to the executor by reason of the transaction should be allowed to the stockbroker as a credit in a suit to recover back the funds so invested. 42. Peo. v. California Safe Deposit, etc., Co., 168 Cal. 241, 247, 141 P 1181, 1184, LRA1915A 299 ("We are cited by respondent to a number of cases in support of their position that mutuality must exist between the demands in order to warrant a setoff between them, and particularly to cases where in actions by administrators or executors to recover money belonging to the estate on a liability created after the death of the testator or intestate it is held that claims against the estate, accruing prior to the death of the decedent, could not be asserted therein as setoffs. There can be no question but that the general rule as to the necessity of mutuality is as asserted by respondent, and it may be conceded that in a strict sense there is no mutuality between the claims here under consideration; they are not due to and from the same parties and in the same capacity. The general rule, too, is well settled, as claimed, that in actions by executors or administrators upon a cause of action arising to them after the death of the testator or intestate, a defendant cannot setoff a demand against the decedent existing at the time of his death. But this general rule is subject to exceptions which are applied in suits brought by executors or administrators such as above referred to, as well as in other actions, though we are now only concerned with ascertaining whether as to the claims here sought to be set off against each other an exception should apply. It will be found that when cases of the character cited are examined, but where in such actions by executors or administrators the right of setoff has been denied to the defendants, such denial is not so much based on a want of mutuality (and that ground in many of them is not assigned as the reason), but is put upon the ground that the allowance of such a setoff might disturb the just and equal distribution of the assets of the estate among its creditors in any case where it was uncertain from the unsettled condition of the estate whether the assets were sufficient to pay all the debts of the decedent, or in the case of an estate which was actually insolvent the allowance of such setoff would not only prevent a pro rata distribution among its creditors, but, on the contrary, would give the creditor claiming the benefit of a setoff an undue preference over other creditors of the estate to the extent of full payment of his claim. . . . When, however, by reason of the special character of an asserted setoff, it appears that in no particular can the rights of any party interested in the assets of the estate be affected by its allowance, or when the estate is solvent and able to pay all claims against it, including the allowed claim of a defendant asserting it as a setoff, the courts in the first instance do not, and in the latter should not, apply the strict rule of mutuality to prevent the allowance of the setoff. It has been held that persons paying funeral expenses of a decedent may set off the amount thereof in an action by the executor or administrator upon a claim owed by them to the decedent in his lifetime. . . . It is also held that, upon proof that all debts of the testator had been paid, an executor who was sole legatee could avail himself of a chose in action belonging to the estate as a counterclaim in an action against him. Blood v. Kane, 130 N. Y. 514, 29 NE 994, 15 LRA 490. Want of mutuality was not permitted in these cases cited to defeat the right of set-off; it being allowed in the first for the reason that other creditors of the estate could not be prejudiced, as the set-off was allowed in the last for the estate, and such set-off was allowed in the last for like reason. We refer to these cases as showing that the rule of mutuality is not always controlling in actions by or against personal representatives of an estate which involves its assets, but that it will be departed from in cases where it appears that permitting the set-off to be interposed cannot in any respect embarrass the administration of the estate or prejudice the rights or interests of any other party interested in its assets").

in his individual or in his representative character,[45] and it applies with equal force whether the contract sued on was made with the personal representative,[46] or with decedent, if no cause of action arose thereon until after his death.[47]

The reason for the rule is that the allowance of the set-off or counterclaim would necessarily destroy the equal and just distribution of the assets belonging to the estate among creditors in every case where the assets were insufficient to pay all the debts.[48] Again, to allow the administrator to bind the estate by the appropriation of the debts due to the estate, not due from defendant to the intestate in his lifetime, to be applied to the satisfaction of a debt due defendant upon a contract made with the intestate would open the door for avoiding statutes which require that all such claims against the estate must be presented to and allowed by commissioners appointed by the proper court, and for the allowance of claims against the estate which had been barred by the statutes of nonclaim because not presented and allowed as required by law.[49]

[§ 1869] (2) Claim Accruing after Decedent's Death against Causes of Action Arising in His Lifetime—(a) General Rule. It is usually considered that demands on which causes of action arise subsequent to decedent's death are not proper subjects of set-off against demands on causes of action arising in decedent's lifetime, because there is no mutuality of indebtedness between the parties,[50] although the contrary view has been asserted.[51]

[a] Effect of special agreement by representative.—It is not within the power of an administrator to bind the assets in his hands by an agreement that a debt contracted by his intestate may be set off against one contracted to himself in favor of the estate and an answer setting up such agreement presents no defense available either at law or in equity. of the expenses of administration entitled to priority of payment over all charges except funeral expenses, and the party rendering them has his option to hold the administrator or the estate liable therefor, an attorney who is sued to compel payment of money collected for the estate may set off a claim for services rendered in the settlement of the estate.[52] In some jurisdictions claims for funeral expenses may be set off in a suit brought by the personal representative to collect a debt due decedent.[53] It has also been held that the rule that a demand against decedent which accrued after his death cannot be set off in an action by the personal representative does not apply where the action is for the proceeds of decedent's note discounted by defendant, and defendant was induced to discount the note by decedent's fraudulent representations as to his solvency since the fraud relates back and vitiates the entire transaction, although the note matured and the fraud was discovered after decedent's death;[54] and that debts of decedent not due at the time of his death may be set off in an action on a claim due before decedent's death under a statute providing that, in an action by a personal representative, a demand against decedent which at the time of the death belonged to defendant may be set off in the same manner as if the action had been brought by decedent,[55] or under a statute providing that when cross demands have existed between persons under such circumstances that one could be pleaded as a counterclaim or set-off to an action brought upon the other, neither can be deprived of the benefit thereof by the assignment or death of the other and that the demands must be deemed compensated so far as they equal each other.[56] So also where the intestate held the note of defendant and agreed that it should be paid by boarding, etc., his children, and afterward the administrator sanctioned the agreement, defendant was allowed to set it up in a suit on the note by the administrator de bonis non as to board both before and after the death of the intestate.[57]

A distinction based on solvency of the estate has been recognized, it being held that, where an administrator sues on a cause of action arising before decedent's death, defendant, if the estate is solvent, may set off a debt due by decedent when the suit was brought but becoming due after his death,[58] although such a set-off cannot be permitted where the estate is insolvent.[59]

[§ 1871] (3) Debts Due in Decedent's Lifetime against Causes of Action Accruing in His Lifetime. Where suit is brought on a cause of action accruing before decedent's death, defendant is entitled to set off a debt due him from decedent before his death.[60]

[§ 1872] (4) Claims Accruing after Decedent's Death against Causes of Action Accruing after His Death. As a general rule a demand against the personal representative may be set off against a demand of the personal representative arising after testator's death,[61] but where a creditor is sued on his agreement to refund to the estate, on its final settlement, the amount of his debt advanced him by the administrator, he cannot set off his debt against the estate,[62] and in a suit by administrators in their representative capacity to recover assets of the estate loaned by them, defendant cannot set off the value of his services rendered the estate at the request of the administrators, since the administrators can make no new contract binding the estate, unless specially authorized by law, and defendant's remedy is personal against them.[63]

the other party jointly with others as parties.[64] Consequently in an action by a personal representative on a demand due by defendant alone defendant cannot set off a demand against decedent due to himself and another jointly,[65] nor can he set off a demand due him from decedent and others jointly.[66]

[§ 1874] (6) Claims Growing Out of Partnership Dealings between Defendant and Decedent. In an action by a personal representative to recover on a claim due decedent, claims growing out of partnership dealings between decedent and defendant are not a proper subject of set-off or counterclaim where there has been no accounting or final settlement of the partnership affairs.[67]

[§ 1875] (7) Legacies or Distributive Shares. Where suit is brought by a personal representative against a legatee the latter cannot in general plead as a set-off the amount of his legacy, at least where it is not shown that the estate is solvent and is in a condition to be distributed,[68] and some decisions seem to deny the right of set-off altogether on the ground that it would interfere with the regular course of distribution,[69] and enable defendant to obtain his share of the estate before the others would obtain theirs.[70] It is generally held that defendant in an action by the personal representative cannot set off the amount of a distributive share,[71] although such set-offs have been allowed in actions by the personal representative on notes given to them as such by distributees[72] or to recover the purchase price of property of the estate purchased by distributees.[73]

Rule in equity. It has been asserted that a legatee or the purchaser of a distributive share in an estate may in equity set off the same against a judgment in favor of the executor against such legatee or owner of such share, where no special reason exists for the collection of the judgment by the executor.[74]

[§ 1876] (8) Claims against Estate Purchased after Decedent's Death. The general rule is that claims against an estate purchased after decedent's death cannot be set off in an action against the purchaser thereof for a debt due decedent,[75] or even in an action for a debt created after the death of decedent.[76] The reason of this rule is that it is considered contrary to public policy to allow a person indebted to an insolvent estate to purchase a claim against such estate after the death of the intestate and make it available as a set-off in order to escape payment of his own debt.[77] Nevertheless it has been held that the one who is sued by a personal representative may by way of set-off avail himself of notes executed by decedent, although they were assigned to defendant by the payee after death of decedent, if the notes are such as would be proper matters of set-off in an action brought by decedent, if he were living, and there is no suggestion of

[a] Reason for rule.—One partner has no claim against his copartner individually on account of partnership transactions, although a final settlement of the affairs would show a balance in favor of the former. Until such final settlement the general rule is that the firm and not the individual partner is the debtor and in such case it cannot be said correctly that there is a debt due from one partner to the other. [§ 1877] d. Actions by Representative for Commissions. In an action by a personal representative for his commissions, the heirs, on showing that the personal representative could have recovered assets belonging to the estate amounting to more than the commissions claimed, but which have been lost to the estate by lapse of time, may plead these facts as a set-off to his claim for commissions.[79]

[§ 1878] e. Actions between Representatives of Different Estates. In an action by one personal representative against another for a debt due from defendant's decedent to plaintiff's decedent during the lifetime of both, defendant may set off a debt due to his decedent from plaintiff's decedent.[80]

[§ 1879] f. Actions Brought by Representative While Exempt from Suit. The fact that an action by an executor or administrator is commenced during the time for which he is exempt from being sued[81] does not preclude defendant from asserting a set-off to which he is entitled.[82]

[§ 1880] g. Effect of Insolvency of Estate.[83] In the absence of some special statutory provision to the contrary,[84] insolvency of an estate is not a ground for denying a set-off in an action brought by the personal representative,[85] for it would be inequitable that the administrator should recover the whole sum against the creditor and the creditor take only the average upon his debt.[86] Where an estate is insolvent the right of set-off is not limited to cases provided for by statutes of set-off,[87] but is based on the equitable principles which govern the settlement and distribution of the insolvent and bankrupt estates of living persons.[88] All mutual demands of every nature and kind are to be set off.[89] Claims which were not due and payable when the action was brought may be set off, providing they became due pending the action,[90] and claims not liquidated, as well as those the amounts of which are ascertained, may be set off.[91] The claimant is not estopped from a plea of set-off because he has exhibited his demand before commissioners in insolvency, whether it has been allowed[92] or disallowed.[93]

Where estate insufficient to make up statutory exemption. Where the only assets left by a decedent, exclusive of a judgment in his favor, are insufficient to make up the statutory exemption in the personalty allowed to the widow and children, and the balance necessary to make up the deficiency, together with the expenses of the last sickness and of administration, will exhaust such judg-

78. McGinnis v. Allen, 2 Swan (Tenn.) 645, 646 ("If in an action by Allen, in his lifetime, the notes would have been proper matters of set-off, they are equally so in an action by his personal representatives. We are aware of no principle upon which the distinction taken by the circuit judge can be maintained. The time of the assignment, whether prior or subsequent to the intestate's death, is immaterial, provided it were before the institution of the suit. It is well settled by the course of decision under the act of 1756, ch. 4, sec. 7, that if the defendant, in an action in which a plea of set-off is an admissible defense, were, at the time of the commencement of such action, the holder and proper owner of a note or bill single executed by the plaintiff, either by endorsement or delivery, he may avail himself of such note or bill single as a set-off to the plaintiff's demand. 8 Humphr. 46; 1 Swan 258; id. 92. Such debts are regarded as 'mutual' within the meaning of the act. The set-off is given as a more summary and convenient remedy than a cross-action. The policy of the statute is to suppress useless litigation, and its provisions are therefore entitled to receive a favorable and liberal construction. The argument against the admissibility of the set-off relied upon in this case, deduced from the policy of the statutes regulating the administration of insolvent estates, however well founded as applicable to cases conducted under the provisions of those statutes, has no application to the present case. So far as appears from this record, no suggestion of the insolvency of the intestate's estate has been or could be made. If the estate be in fact insolvent, it is the business of the administrators to resort to the proper proceedings under the statutes").

"The objection taken to it [the set-off] is that the debt against the defendant was a part of the assets to be distributed pro rata among all the creditors, and that the defendant's account must be filed, and be subject to a ratable deduction if the estate turned out to be insufficient to pay all the debts; that if he is allowed to plead his account as a set-off, he will in that way get the whole of it, to the prejudice of other creditors. Though this reasoning is plausible, it is not sound. The notes and accounts of the deceased are not assets, if they have been discharged by payment, the creation of adverse accounts, or otherwise. It is only what remains, after all just settlements with the debtors of the estate, which goes into the fund for distribution." Richardson v. Parker, supra.

ment, the judgment debtor cannot offset a judgment against decedent, purchased by him, although it was bought prior to the filing of the appraise bill of decedent's effects in which the widow's allowance was made out of the decedent's judgment.[94]

[§ 1881] h. Necessity for Presentment or Demand—(1) In General. In some jurisdictions it is considered that in the absence of any special statutory provision on the subject presentation of a claim is not a condition precedent to its availability as a set-off against a claim of the estate,[95] so that if the creditor does not care to make any affirmative claim against the estate, but desires to use his claim only as a protection against any claim which the estate may set up against him, he may safely wait until he is sued by the representative and then set up his claim by way of set-off.[96] Accordingly, in construing a statute providing that no "action" shall be brought against a personal representative until after demand is made of him for payment, accompanied by affidavit and proof, it has been held that demand is unnecessary to authorize a set-off in a suit by the administrator against the holder thereof,[97] but that the claim must be verified and proceed in the manner required by law in the case of claims sued upon in a direct action.[98] It has also been held that notwithstanding a statute providing that no claimant shall maintain any action on his claim unless it is first presented to the personal representative, such presentation is not essential to the right of set-off where another statute provides that if two parties have cross demands which one may plead as a set-off in an action by the other, neither can be deprived of the benefit thereof by the death of the other and that the two demands must be deemed compensated so far as they equal each other,[99] and that under a statute providing that, if an administrator commences an action to recover in the interest of the estate, defendant may set off any claim he has against the deceased instead of presenting it to the probate court, such offset is permissible even though the time for filing claims has expired.[1] Again it has been held that failure to present a claim to the commissioners and procure its allowance will not bar the right of set-off in an action by the personal representative where his own fraudulent acts prevented its presentation.[2] On the other hand some statutes expressly provide that a claim shall not be available as a set-off unless it is duly filed,[3] and there is also considerable authority for the view that, where the

"The statute applies to and contemplates cases where the creditor is the actor, and himself moves in the matter of getting the allowance. There he must proceed within a certain time or be forever barred. But a person may well have a demand against an estate, and knowing that he is also indebted to the estate, neglect to prove up the same, supposing that the amounts are about equal, and that when he is proceeded against, he can plead his demand as a set-off and thus determine the whole matter in one suit. If in such a case the administrator should wait till after two years had expired before instituting such an action, it was certainly never designed or intended that the creditor should be deprived of a just or lawful claim." [a] Construction of statutes.—Under Howell St. Annot. § 5901, which provides that any person failing to present his claim in the time limited shall be barred from recovering on it, or setting it off in any action, § 5894, which provides that at any time before the estate is closed, further time may be allowed for presenting a claim, § 5904, which provides that nothing in the chapter including those sections shall prevent an executor or administrator from commencing an action against another person, or prosecuting an action commenced by deceased, and § 5905, which provides in such case that defendant may set off any claim against deceased without presenting it to the commissioners, where after the expiration of the time for presenting claims to the commissioners an administrator begins an action, defendant cannot set off a claim which he had not presented to them. Quinn v. McGovern, 97 Mich. 114, 56 NW 226.

[b] Effect of failure to appoint commissioners.—The rule stated in the text does not apply where no commissioners to whom the claim might be presented were ever appointed. Boltwood v. Miller, 112 Mich. 657, 71 NW 506.

[c] Misleading statement of court.—The fact that the probate judge told a claimant that it was not necessary to file his claim and that it could be used as a set-off against a note given by the claimant to decedent does not alter the rule that a claim must be presented to authorize its allowance by way of set-off. Benjamin v. Early, 123 Mich. 93, 81 NW 973.

[d] Rule under Vermont statutes.—Under Gen. St. p 401 § 14 which provides that if a claimant does not exhibit his claim to the commissioners within the time limited by the court for that purpose he shall be forever barred from pleading it as a set-off in any action whatever, and § 17 which chapter provides that, in an action by the personal representative on a claim due the estate, defendant may plead in offset any claim he has against deceased instead of presenting it to the commissioners, the right of set-off exists only in cases where the administrator brings his suit before the commissioners have acted, where the institution of the suit prevents the offset before the commissioners. Probate Ct. v. Gale, 47 Vt. 473; Soule v. Benton, 44 Vt. 309; Ewing v. Griswold, 43 Vt. 400.

statute provides that claims not filed within the time allowed shall be forever barred, claims not so filed are not available as set-offs,[4] the view being taken that enforcing the claim by means of set-off is substantially equivalent to enforcing it by an action.[5] It has also been held that the bar created by a decree made upon proceedings to limit creditors of deceased persons applies to debts and demands alleged by way of set-off.[6] So also presentation has been held necessary under a statute to the effect that no demand shall be pleaded by way of set-off which was not justly due and accruing to the party pleading it at the time of the commencement of the suit.[7]

Estoppel in equity. Where a creditor of an insolvent estate, relying on an agreement with the administrator to allow the creditor's claim in offset to demands against him in favor of the estate, has neglected to present his claim to the commissioners, he is entitled to have it set off in equity against the claim of the estate.[8]

[§ 1882] (2) Where Estate Insolvent. It is usually considered that, where an estate is insolvent, no presentation of a demand is necessary to authorize its use as a set-off in a suit brought by the personal representative, the statutes of non-claim being very generally held not to apply under these circumstances.[9] Under such circumstances, however, a set-off can be used as matter of defense only, and not as the foundation of a recovery of any balance,[10] and if the amount claimed by way of set-off is greater than the amount due the estate, claimant cannot recover the balance without due presentation of the demand.[11]

Equitable principles applicable. In the case of mutual claims between an insolvent estate and a creditor or a debtor, set-off takes place by operation of law upon principles of equity and independently of the statutes relating to set-off.[12]

[§ 1883] i. Necessity of Pleading Set-Offs. In a suit by a personal representative defendant is not bound to plead a set-off,[13] unless he wishes to recover thereon;[14] but a set-off or counterclaim cannot be asserted unless properly pleaded.[15]

[§ 1884] 2. Actions against Personal Representatives. In actions against personal representatives on claims against decedent they are entitled to set off claims in decedent's favor against plaintiff.[16]

Shimer v. Kinder, 12 NYSt 728. (2) In an action on a claim due from decedent the personal representative may set off the claim of decedent against plaintiff on an instrument acknowledging the receipt of a sum of money in trust to be accounted for to decedent which is liquidated and payable on demand and that too whether it is considered as in trust or a mere debt. Gannon v. Ruffin, 151 Mass. 204, 24 NE 37. (3) In an action against an executor in his representative capacity on accounts stated by him as executor, a set-off of debts due from plaintiff to the testator is permissible, because an account stated by an executor as such shows a debt due from testator to plaintiff. Blakesley v. Smallwood, 8 Q. B. 538, 55 ECL 538, 115 Reprint 978.

[b] Where a suit is brought by the administrator of one intestate against the administrator of another intestate for a debt due from the intestate of one to the intestate of the other in their lifetime, defendant may set off a debt that was due from plaintiff's intestate to his intestate. Barnard v. Jordan, 25 N. C. 268.

The general rule is that a personal representative, when sued in his official capacity, may set off only those claims which decedent himself might have pleaded and which are due to his estate,[17] and cannot set off a claim due him in his individual capacity.[18] So, in an action for a debt due from decedent, defendant cannot set off a sum due on a note given by plaintiff to him as administrator for goods of his intestate which he had sold as administrator.[19] Neither can the representative set off a demand purchased by him after the death of decedent against a debt due by the estate to the person against whom such demand exists.[20] In an action against a personal representative in his individual capacity it is not permissible to set off claims due the estate as the claims are not between the same parties nor in the same right,[21] but the representative may set off a claim due to himself individually,[22] or due to himself and another individually, provided the other consents, but not otherwise.[23] Where an executor voluntarily pays a legacy without a refunding bond and afterward the estate is found to be insolvent, the executor may, in an action by the legatee against him for a debt due from testator, set off what he has paid upon the legacy beyond the proportion which he should have paid.[24] After the administration is wound up the commissions are due the administrator and ascertainable and may be counterclaimed in any action by the heirs without being reduced to judgment.[25]

Necessity of pleading set-off. An administrator is not bound to set off any debt or demand which the estate may have against a suing creditor, and his failure to do so will not bar such debt or demand.[26] On the other hand it has been held that in an action against a personal representative for a debt of the decedent, payments, credits, or off-sets are in issue, although not pleaded by defendant.[27]

[§ 1885] G. Jurisdiction—1. Action on Claims in Favor of or against Estate—a. In General. Actions on claims in favor of an estate should be brought in courts of ordinary jurisdiction and not in the probate court.[28] The same is usually true

[d] In an action against the administrator and the former partner of decedent, a demand in favor of decedent alone may be set off by the administrator. Eyrich v. Capital State Bank, 67 Miss. 60, 6 S 615.

[e] Where estate insolvent.—In a suit on a note given by decedent if the estate is declared insolvent, claims between plaintiff and the estate are subject to be set off, and the balance on it should be allowed to be recovered, although there could have been no set-off if both parties had lived. Medomak Bank v. Curtis, 24 Me. 36.

[f] Support of child.—In an action by a child against his mother's administrator for money received by her as his guardian, the administrator cannot set up a claim for the support and education of her child by the intestate unless it appears that she intended to charge him therefor. [g] Time of filing set-off.—Under a statute providing that an executor or administrator shall not be obliged to make a defense for one year after his appointment, he may file an account in set-off on the first day of the term next after the close of the year from the date of his appointment, although the action may have been begun at a previous term. As a general proposition, the contention urged by appellant's counsel may be conceded as correct, but it is believed that cases of this kind should be excepted from the rule of law referred to. It is provided by the probate law of this state (Rev. Stats., art. 2072) that 'no executor or administrator shall allow any claim for money against his testator or intestate, nor shall any county judge approve the same, unless such claim is accompanied by an affidavit in writing that the claim is just, and that all legal offsets, payments and credits known to affiant have been allowed.' In enacting this statute, we think it was the intention of the Legislature to cast upon those asserting claims against the estates of deceased persons, the burden of showing that all legal offsets, payments and credits known to the creditor have been allowed and that if the claim be rejected by the administrator, and the creditor seeks to enforce it in court, the burden referred to continues and has application in the trial of the case").

with respect to actions on claims against estates,[29] although the statutes sometimes permit actions of this character to be brought in the probate court.[30] It has been held, however, that a statute authorizing a summary trial in the court of probate jurisdiction does not provide the exclusive mode of trial or preclude an action in a court of ordinary jurisdiction.[31]

[§ 1886] b. Courts of Equity. Where a creditor has exhausted legal remedies without avail, he may sue in equity to subject to his claim an interest in the estate,[32] but one demanding, in his capacity as administrator, money of his intestate alleged to have been lent to and invested by a decedent, and retained by him until the time of his death, and praying that defendant, as administrator of decedent, be required to pay over the money with interest, has an adequate remedy at law, and cannot invoke the aid of equity,[33] especially where the testimony in support of the claim consists of evidence under the control of the claimant.[34] Where the limited powers of the probate court do not permit of adequate relief, a resort to equity is warranted.[35] So a court of equity has jurisdiction of a bill by a creditor to enforce his demand against the executors and legatees, to whom assets have been delivered upon the undertaking to pay all demands,[36] and it has been held that inasmuch as a personal representative is a trustee for creditors and others interested, a court of equity has jurisdiction of an action against the administrator for a debt due from decedent.[37] The jurisdiction of equity cannot be invoked, however, to enforce such a claim, where by statute the relief sought may be obtained in an ordinary legal proceeding in the probate court, and where no special circumstances requiring the aid of a court of equity are disclosed.[38] Under a statute authorizing the probate

"What right has plaintiff, simply a general creditor of a deceased individual, to resort to a court of equity for the collection of his claim? The bill, when the surplusage relating to a partnership and its assets is omitted, does no more than to call upon the personal representatives of the deceased debtor for a settlement of their accounts and a payment of the debts of the decedent. This alone is not ground of equity cognizance. The bill goes no further than to seek to charge in the hands of the personal representatives the decedent's personal estate only, without some showing grounds necessary to equity jurisdiction in that behalf. 'A general creditor of a deceased person cannot maintain a bill in equity against the personal representative, to charge in his hands, the personal estate only, without showing some ground of equity jurisdiction, such as inadequacy of the legal remedies, inability to obtain satisfaction of his debt by pursuit thereof to judgment and execution, or necessity for discovery.' Price v. Laing, 67 W. Va. 373, 68 SE 24." Hutchinson-Stephenson Hat Co. v. Bailey, 73 W. Va. 672, 673, 80 SE 1056.

Parish v. McGowan, 39 App. (D. C.) 184.

[b] A general creditor cannot sustain a bill in equity on a purely legal demand, unless he shows that he has exhausted his legal remedy or that that remedy for some good cause would be inadequate or unavailable. Hale v. White, 47 W. Va. 700, 35 SE 884 (where the bill shows that the estate is solvent and the assets superabundant, the mere pretext of the want of discovery will not give equitable jurisdiction against a personal representative who is not shown to have neglected any of the statutory requirements relating to his duties as such representative to the injury of plaintiff).

[c] Action by creditor who failed to present claim in time.—Orphans' Court Act (P. L. [1898] p 740 et seq § 70 et seq) provides that, if there is a surplus after settlement of an estate, a creditor who has failed to file his claim with the administrator prior to entry of a rule of the orphans' court barring creditors may present his claim to the administrator and be paid to the extent that the surplus be found sufficient for such purpose, and, if the claim so presented is disputed, distribution will be suspended until suit is brought to determine the validity of the claim, and such creditor is also entitled to be paid ratably with other like creditors from such assets as he may find have not been accounted for at final settlement, and that when an administrator without reasonable cause fails to make final settlement of his accounts within a year, or apply for a decree of distribution within three months after final settlement, the orphans' court may extend to such creditor the same relief that he would be entitled to if the final account had been passed and refunding bonds taken for legacies and distributive shares. The act also affords protection to barred creditors by requiring refunding bonds for their benefit when distribution is made by an administrator. 2 Gen. St. p 1679 renders heirs and devisees liable to creditors of decedent to the extent of court to allow an executor a reasonable charge for legal advice and services, and five per cent on money arising from the sale of real estate, it has been held that, where a will authorized an executor to sell land and he employed plaintiffs to give him legal advice concerning the management of the estate, and employed them to find a purchaser for the land, and they did so, whereby a sale was consummated, they were entitled to maintain a suit in equity against the administrator de bonis non with the will annexed to recover for such services, it appearing that their remedies at law in the probate court would have obtained allowance of their demands as of the fifth class, and the nature of the demands being such that they should be paid in priority to creditors.[39] Where suit is brought on a claim secured by a mortgage or trust deed, the court may determine the validity of the trust deed,[40] and the mortgage being an incident of the debt, the court has jurisdiction to settle and determine conflicting claims and interests thereunder.[41] Where a claim against a decedent's estate is transferred from the orphans' court to the chancery court, the latter will take it in the plight and condition it is then in, and proceed with it like other chancery causes, applying the law regulating such estates in the orphans' court.[42] A statute providing that actions, commenced against executors after decedent's death, shall be considered demands legally exhibited against the estate from the time of serving the original process on the executor has reference to the time when claims shall be considered exhibited, and is not authority for the maintenance of a bill in equity to obtain an allowance for a money judgment.[43] A federal court of equity is without jurisdiction of a suit against an executrix to recover for a tort alleged to have been committed by her testator, where she is not charged as trustee, but solely as the personal representative of the tort-feasor.[44]

[§ 1887] 2. Actions on Joint or Joint and Several Obligations. A court of probate has jurisdiction of a claim on which a decedent is jointly and severally liable and may adjudicate upon it as an equitable money claim.[45] It is otherwise, however, as to a claim on which decedent is jointly liable with another which must be enforced in a court of ordinary jurisdiction,[46] as the living joint obligor is not amenable to the jurisdiction of a probate court,[47] unless jurisdiction over such claims is conferred on the probate court by statute.[48]

[§ 1888] 3. Actions for Legacies or Distributive Shares—a. Legacies. In a few English cases it was held that an action might be maintained at law against an executor upon his promise to pay a general legacy in consideration of assets;[49] but these cases were subsequently overruled and the doctrine established that an action at law did not lie for the recovery of a legacy,[50] except in case of specific legacies assented to by the executor, where the action was allowed on the ground that the interest in any specific thing bequeathed vests at law in the legatee upon the assent of the executor.[51] In the United States the right to bring actions at law to recover legacies is sometimes given by statute,[52] and in a number of cases the right to bring such an action has been upheld independently of any statutory provision,[53] whether the promise to pay is express or merely implied,[54] the reason assigned being that the basis for the rule in England does not exist here, as the rights of all legatees, whether married women or infants, are as fully protected by legislation as they could be by any administration of the trust in equity.[55] Other decisions have recognized the English rule as to specific legacies and allow actions at law to recover such assets by them severally received. Under these statutes, a barred creditor has an adequate remedy at law, and he cannot maintain a bill in the court of chancery to draw the administrator into that court where the bill fails to present special reasons calling for such action. [a] Statutes conferring jurisdiction.—Under a statute giving the probate court exclusive jurisdiction over "all suits and other proceedings instituted against executors and administrators upon any demand against the estate of their testator or intestate," the probate court has exclusive jurisdiction of demands arising out of joint obligations of deceased as well as those arising out of his sole obligations. legacies when they are assented to by the executor,[56] and some decisions hold that an action at law will lie on an express promise to pay a general legacy either in consideration of assets or of forbearance,[57] but that an express promise of the executor is necessary to authorize the action.[58] It is also held that assumpsit will lie to recover a legacy where the final report of the executor has been approved, all other debts and legacies have been paid, and the legacy in question has been ordered paid.[59] Legacies are recoverable on a bill in equity,[60] and assent by the executor is unnecessary, as a court of equity, which regards the executor as a trustee, will compel him to assent and pay the legacy.[61] It has been held that this jurisdiction of equity is not taken away by the fact that an action at law may be maintained for the recovery of a legacy,[62] although there is authority for the contrary view.[63]

[§ 1889] b. Distributive Shares. An action at law does not lie to recover a distributive share of an intestate's property,[64] even though the personal representative may have expressly promised to pay,[65] unless such an action is authorized by statute.[66] A bill in equity is the appropriate remedy for the recovery of a distributive share,[67] an administrator being considered a trustee for the benefit of those entitled to distributive shares in an estate.[68] Even though a statutory remedy by action at law is given for the recovery of a distributive share of an estate, this remedy is merely cumulative and does not qualify or limit the jurisdiction of equity over the subject.[69]

[§ 1890] 4. Suits to Determine Rights of Devisees. A suit to determine the rights of devisees is properly cognizable in equity.[70]

[§ 1891] 5. Actions Based on Malfeasance or Misfeasance of Personal Representative. The jurisdiction of the probate court is usually adequate to afford a complete remedy against an administrator for failure to return an inventory or conversion of assets of the estate to his own use,[71] and where this is the case neither a court of ordinary common-law jurisdiction,[72] nor the chancery court[73] will assume jurisdiction. Where, however, the estate has been finally settled and the representative discharged the jurisdiction of the probate court is exhausted, and actions based on improper administration cannot be brought therein, but must be brought in another tribunal.[74] The administrator of an executor cannot be sued at law for a devastavit of the latter;[75] resort must be had to a court of equity, where the liabilities of the succeeding representatives and their sureties can be adjusted;[76] and a court of equity is the proper tribunal to investigate and grant relief against the fraudulent combination by the personal representative and others confederating to injure those interested in the faithful administration of the estate;[77] in no other court can appropriate relief be afforded.[78]

[§ 1892] 6. Suits for Specific Performance. Specific performance is strictly a subject of equity jurisdiction;[79] and suits to enforce specific performance of a contract entered into by a person since deceased must be brought in a court of chancery in the absence of special statutes conferring jurisdiction on some other court.[80] To authorize any other court to exercise jurisdiction, it must be clearly conferred and cannot be given by implication merely.[81] In some states the statues have conferred on probate courts jurisdiction to entertain suits of the character under consideration,[82] and such jurisdiction has been held to be exclusive[83] although it is more commonly regarded as concurrent with the jurisdiction of courts of equity,[84] where there is nothing in the act conferring jurisdiction which indicates an intention to restrict the bringing of such suits to the probate court.[85]

[§ 1893] 7. Suits to Enforce Liens. The enforcement of vendor's liens belongs to the jurisdiction of chancery courts,[86] and a probate court has no authority to enforce such lien unless this is conferred by statute.[87] The statutory jurisdiction of the probate court in such matters is sometimes made exclusive,[88] but unless a legislative intent to confer exclusive jurisdiction is clearly apparent, the jurisdiction of equity is not ousted.[89] Jurisdiction with respect to the foreclosure of mortgages given by decedent is sometimes conferred by statute on the probate courts,[90] but the mere grant of such jurisdiction, without indication of legislative intent to make it exclusive, leaves concurrent jurisdiction in the courts of equity.[91] A court of chancery and not a court of probate has jurisdiction to enforce a lien of an heir against land purchased by an administrator out of funds of the estate.[92]

[§ 1894] 8. Actions or Suits to Set Aside Fraudulent Conveyances. Where a personal representative in behalf of creditors of the estate seeks to set aside a conveyance of realty by decedent made in fraud of creditors, suit must be brought in a court of equity.[93] It has been considered, however, that if the property sought to be reached is personalty, an action for its recovery may be brought in a court of law,[94] and even that such action must be brought in a court of law and a bill in equity cannot be maintained.[95] But there is also authority for the view that the only remedy of an administrator who seeks to recover goods transferred by his decedent in fraud of creditors is in equity, and he cannot maintain an action at law for the purpose.[96]

[§ 1895] 9. Actions on Contracts of Personal Representatives. Common-law tribunals and not probate courts have jurisdiction of actions against personal representatives on contracts made by them, which bind them and not the estate, in the absence of some statute conferring jurisdiction on probate courts.[97] If by statute the contract binds the estate

[a] Surrogate's court without jurisdiction.—L (1897) p 509 c 417 § 7, providing that a creditor of a deceased insolvent debtor may maintain an action to set aside a fraudulent conveyance by deceased, does not confer on the surrogate's court authority to determine whether a transfer by a testator was void as fraudulent, since such transfer may be attacked only in a court of equity. In re Bunting, 98 App. Div. 122, 126, 90 NYS 786 ("Assuming, however, that the Legislature intended to confer such power and authority upon the Surrogate's Court as is claimed for it by the petitioner, the statute would be clearly condemned by the provisions of section 15 of article 6 of the Constitution. So far as applicable this section reads: 'Surrogates and Surrogates' Courts shall have the jurisdiction and powers which the surrogates and existing Surrogates' Courts now possess, until otherwise provided by the Legislature.' We have already seen by the authorities cited that Surrogates' Courts neither before nor since the adoption of this provision of the Constitution possessed general equitable powers, and there exists no authority in the Legislature to confer it upon them. They have such jurisdiction and such only as they possessed at the time of the adoption of the constitution, and may exercise such jurisdiction until otherwise provided by the Legislature. The language excludes authority to add to the jurisdiction possessed by such courts. The only power reserved in the Legislature is to regulate, take away, cut down or limit the jurisdiction thus conferred; but no authority exists to add to it. If it did the Constitution would not have imposed any limitation or be a bar to the conferring of the most ample jurisdiction, both legal and equitable, which could be provided by law. Manifestly such is not its construction. It may withhold power, but it cannot grant it beyond the limitation of its exercise existing at the time when the Constitution was adopted").

[a] Circuit court.—Under the statute providing that any person and not the representative personally the probate court has exclusive original jurisdiction to enforce it,[98] and, under a statute giving probate courts jurisdiction in all suits against administrators arising from any duty omitted in the discharge of their trusts, an action may be brought in the probate court to compel specific performance of a contract of sale of land against an administrator who had individually executed a bond to convey to his intestate prior to his death and who in selling his intestate's interest in the land executed a bond to convey in his individual capacity instead of signing as administrator the bond that had been executed in favor of his intestate.[99]

[§ 1896] 10. Actions on Claims of Personal Representative against Estate. Where an administrator has a claim to any portion of the property alleged by the creditors to belong to the estate and his claim is adverse to that of the creditors, they may resort to a court of equity to have the controversy settled.[1] A statute providing that any person having a demand against an estate may establish the same by the judgment of some court of record in the ordinary course of proceedings confers on circuit courts jurisdiction to establish demands against estates of deceased persons, but does not give them jurisdiction to adjust the claims of a personal representative for his services and expenses against the estate in his hands.[2]

[§ 1897] 11. Actions to Charge Personal Representative Individually. Actions of this character are usually brought in courts of ordinary jurisdiction;[3] but under some statutes the probate court has jurisdiction of proceedings to charge a personal representative individually for a debt of decedent.[4]

[§ 1898] 12. Suits between Personal Representatives. Subject to some few exceptions, courts of law have no jurisdiction of suits by one personal representative against another, suits of this character being of equitable cognizance.[5] Where a bill filed by an executor against his coexecutor sought to enjoin the latter from consummating and carrying out a wrongful scheme to despoil the estate and to get control of its interests represented by an outside corporation, the probate court had no jurisdiction in equity to enjoin defendant from consummating such act, and hence the fact that the probate court intervened by displacing defendant executor with an administrator with the will annexed did not require a dismissal of the bill.[6]

[§ 1899] 13. Interpleader. Where, on a bill in equity by an administrator against a claimant to determine whether a note payable to the deceased in defendant's possession was received by him from the deceased as a gift causa mortis, both parties consented to the filing of a bill of interpleader by the representative of the deceased maker of the note and the payment into court by him of the amount due thereon, the court's jurisdiction to try the question of ownership of the note became unquestionable.[7]

[§ 1900] 14. Set-Off or Counterclaim. The set-off of one judgment against another is a matter of equitable cognizance and the probate court has no power to try the validity of the judgments of other tribunals or the right of personal representatives to set off one judgment against another.[8] A court of equity has not jurisdiction to set off a claim against the estate not reduced to judgment against a judgment in favor of the estate.[9] Courts in which suit is brought by a personal representative to enforce a demand in favor of the estate are very generally held to have jurisdiction to entertain a claim against the estate and allow it by way of set-off and counterclaim, provided it is of such a character that it will admit of being set off or counterclaimed.[10] Statutes vesting the probate court with exclusive jurisdiction of suits or proceedings on demands against an estate only contemplate a voluntary proceeding against an estate and do not deny the right to make any defense on being involuntarily brought into another court.[11] Nevertheless the court in which the set-off is pleaded has jurisdiction only so far as the claims extinguish each other;[12] no judgment can be rendered for a balance in favor of defendant;[13] and the jurisdiction is further restricted by the character of the claims which are sought to be set off against each other.[14] The superior court sitting in probate has jurisdiction to enforce a set-off by an administrator in a proceeding to enforce payment of an allowed claim, although it is not authorized to award judgment in favor of the administrator for any excess.[15]

[§ 1901] 15. Miscellaneous. If property of a person is inventoried by an administrator as belonging to an estate, the owner may sue at law for its recovery and a bill in equity will not lie, where the remedy at law is adequate.[16] To recover money paid to the distributee in case new debts appear against the intestate, the remedy of the administrator is in equity.[17] The representative may file a bill in chancery against one who intermeddles and embezzles goods of the estate, instead of proceeding at law, where statutes expressly authorize a suit in equity under these circumstances.[18] Statutes giving a court jurisdiction over all suits of executors and administrators on any "demand" against the estate confer on such court jurisdiction of an action of trespass for acts committed by decedent.[19] While a court of probate jurisdiction may entertain proceedings in the nature of a discovery against persons charged with secreting or refusing to account for property belonging to an estate, yet its power having a claim against an estate may establish it by judgment or decree of some court of record, the circuit court has jurisdiction of an action by an attorney to establish a claim for services rendered a decedent's estate. Nichols v. Reyburn, 55 Mo. A. 1.

ends with the discovery, so that the right or title of decedent to property claimed by or from his administrator must if an adjudication becomes necessary be litigated in courts of ordinary jurisdiction.[20] Under a statute providing that actions may be prosecuted against executors in the circuit court when the county court cannot afford a remedy as adequate or efficient, the circuit court has jurisdiction of a suit by executors of a deceased director of a corporation to wind up the corporation, in which a cross bill is filed against the executors to recover, as a corporate asset, a sum alleged to be due the corporation from the estate of the director because of his wrongful conversion of the goodwill of the corporation.[21] A suit for an injunction against an administrator, charging a conspiracy between him and another, a resident of the county, to defraud the estate, and the distributee and creditors, and praying substantial relief against the other defendant is within the jurisdiction of the superior court of the county.[22]

[§ 1902] 16. Estoppel to Object to Jurisdiction. Where a petition for the seizure and sale of the mortgaged property of a deceased person was filed in the United States courts against the executor, alleging plaintiff to be a citizen of Tennessee and defendant of Louisiana, and the proceedings went on to a sale without any objection to the jurisdiction of the court by the executor on the ground of residence of the parties, it is too late for a curator, appointed in the place of the executor, to raise the objection in the state court against a purchaser at the sale.[23]

[§ 1903] H. Venue—1. Actions against Personal Representative. As a general rule, an executor or administrator cannot sue or be sued in any jurisdiction other than the one in which he was appointed.[24] A personal representative may be sued in the county in which he resides,[25] or where he is found,[26] unless the estate is being administered in another county.[27] It is sometimes required by statute that an action against an executor or administrator should be brought in the county where the estate is being administered,[28] and such a provision has been held to apply to an action against an executor or administrator who is sued together with other defendants who are not representatives of the estate,[29] although it has also been asserted that, when an administrator is a necessary party to an action, he may be sued in any county where any of his codefendants reside.[30] Such a requirement has, however, been held not to apply to an action for the construction of a will,[31] to an action against an independent executor for property belonging to minor children which is alleged to have been wasted,[32] to a suit for a community debt against the administratrix of community property,[33] to a suit by distributees against the administrator and the sureties on his bond,[34] or to a suit to recover a legacy payable at a specific time,[35] or to actions in which the personal representative is not sued in his character as such.[36] A statute providing that all actions on official bonds "or against" personal representatives in their official capacity shall be instituted in the county where the bond shall have been given, if the principal or any of the sureties is in the county, applies to all actions against personal representatives in their capacity as such, whether sued on the bond or merely as executor or administrator.[37] An action to settle a deceased guardian's estate and recover funds misappropriated has been held to be maintainable in the county in which the administrator and the deceased guardian qualified, although a party participating in the misappropriation was domiciled in another county.[38] Statutes sometimes permit actions against personal representatives to be brought either in the county where they reside or were appointed or where they can be served personally.[39] Where a statute requires suits against an executor for distribution to be brought in the county where he qualifies, a plea of set-off equivalent to such suit to an action which the executors bring in a different county cannot be sustained.[40] Executors are not public officers within the meaning of statutes relating to place of trial of actions against public officers.[41] Where an administrator wrongfully inventories property of another's estate, the administrator of the latter estate may sue for its recovery in the county where he took out administration, although the court of another county has jurisdiction of the estate of defendant's intestate.[42] Where a devisee of land conveyed it to a minor, taking the minor's note therefor, and died before the minor reached his majority, an action against the devisee's administratrix by the minor on reaching his majority to set aside the note and cancel the deed is not a suit for the settlement of the devisee's estate, and may be brought in the county where the administratrix resides where she had removed from the county in which decedent had his domicile and in which she received her appointment.[43] A nominal party cannot be constituted an administrator and thus by uniting him with the real party in interest withdraw the jurisdiction from the county of the residence of the latter.[44] An action by an executor against a bank to compel it to transfer the stock to a certain devisee of the testator is a transitory action.[45]

[§ 1904] 2. Actions by Personal Representative. Actions which are transitory and not local in their nature need not be brought by a personal representative in the county where the estate is being administered,[46] and he may bring suit on a note executed to decedent by a nonresident and payable at the maker's residence in the state in which his letters issued.[47] Where the assets prove insufficient to pay debts, an action by the representative to set aside his decedent's conveyance of realty is properly brought in the county where the land is situated.[48] A suit by an executor of an insolvent estate, to marshal the assets and enjoin pending actions of creditors, may be brought in the county of the residence of any creditor of the estate.[49]

[§ 1905] 3. Change of Venue. Claims filed against a decedent's estate are civil suits within statutes relating to change of venue,[50] and a statute authorizing change of venue on application of any freeholder sued in any action not local out of the county of his residence applies to actions against personal representatives.[51] Change of venue to a county in which the personal representative is by statute required to be sued is proper when the action is brought in another county.[52] Where a defendant dies pending an action, his personal representative is not entitled to have the action removed to the county where the estate is being administered.[53]

[§ 1906] I. Time to Sue—1. Premature Commencement of Action—a. In Absence of Statute. There can of course be no action against personal representatives as such, until the will, if any, has been probated and the personal representatives have qualified and received letters testamentary or of administration;[54] and if the right to maintain an action depends on plaintiff's appointment the action must fail if the appointment was not made until after the action was commenced.[55] As soon as letters are issued the representatives become liable to be sued by persons holding claims against the estate,[56] in the absence of any statute protecting them from suit for a designated period,[57] although it is proper that such an action should be stayed for a reasonable time to enable the representative to ascertain the actual condition of the estate.[58]

An action to settle an estate may be brought as soon as the representative qualifies,[59] and hence, where part of the relief demanded, in an action against an administrator, is a settlement of the estate, a dismissal of the entire petition is improper.[60]

A suit by a mortgagee to fix his rights against a decedent's estate is premature when brought before default.[61]

An action on a contingent claim which has been rejected cannot be brought until the happening of the contingency which renders the claim an absolute one.[62]

A legatee or distributee cannot ordinarily maintain an action against an executor or administrator for his share of the estate until there has been a decree for distribution,[63] although the rule may be otherwise in case of a suit for an accounting and settlement,[64] or a suit by the widow to enforce an antenuptial agreement.[65]

[§ 1907] b. Under Statutes—(1) In General. In many jurisdictions there have been enacted statutes which protect personal representatives from suit for a designated period after letters testamentary or of administration are granted,[66] and where an action is brought before the expiration of the statutory period, the court is without jurisdiction and may dismiss on its own motion or on the application of a party.[67] A statute protecting personal representatives from compulsory payment for a certain time after taking out letters does not, it is held, prohibit action against the representative within such time.[68] Provision is, however, sometimes made for the granting by the court of leave to sue before the expiration of the period of delay where it appears that unless the creditor is thus permitted to sue he will be deprived of his remedy by virtue of another statute.[69]

[§ 1908] (2) Persons Protected by Statute. Statutes protecting the representative from suit for a certain time apply to an executor who is also residuary legatee and who has given bond to pay debts and legacies,[70] and to an ordinary, on whom the duties and rights of an executor are cast by statute.[71] Where a plaintiff has died pending action, and his administrator has been substituted as plaintiff, a statute prohibiting actions against representatives within a certain period after their appointment, and judgments against them within a certain longer period, does not protect defendant from being forced to trial before the time when judgment might be rendered against the representative.[72]

[§ 1909] (3) Actions to Which Statutes Applicable. Some statutes protecting personal representatives from actions have been held to apply to suits in equity as well as actions at law;[73] but other statutes for this purpose have been held to apply only to actions at law.[74] While the statutes are applicable where the personal representative as such is a necessary defendant,[75] the suit must be against the personal representative as such. If brought against him in his personal capacity the exemption does not apply.[76]

Such statutes have been held to apply to a bill to enforce a vendor's lien for purchase money,[77] an action to recover counsel fees,[78] a bill by a creditor of the administrator to be subrogated to the administrator's rights as creditor of the estate, the latter having paid a debt of the estate with his own money, in fraud of complainant's rights,[79] and a bill against one both personally and as administrator charging him with a fraudulent transfer to decedent.[80]

Such statutes have been held not to apply to an action of detinue,[81] an action arising out of a breach of duty on the representative's part,[82] a suit against an executor to enforce a testamentary trust,[83] a suit by a legatee to whom the will gave "a comfortable support" during her lifetime to compel the executors to set aside a suitable allowance for her support,[84] a suit for an accounting of decedent's

The estate is admittedly solvent, and no rights of creditors are involved or can be prejudiced. This is not a suit, within the meaning of the statute, such as may be instituted against the executors of a last will and testament within the prescribed period; nor is it a proceeding instituted by a legatee or annuitant to compel distribution. Appellee does not stand in the attitude of either. She was granted by the terms of the will a 'comfortable support' during her life; and in view of her advanced

[§ 1910] (4) Removal, Resignation, or Death of Original Representative. Where an administrator resigns or is removed, his successor is not entitled to the full period of exemption from suit; but the time from which the exemption commences is the date of the qualification of the original administrator,[97] and the same principle is applicable where letters of administration are revoked on presentation and proof of a will naming as executor the person appointed as administrator,[98] although it has been held otherwise where letters were revoked because of failure of the representative to give sufficient bond.[99] That the successor of an administrator who has died is entitled to the full statutory period of exemption from the time of his own appointment has been both asserted [1] and denied.[2]

[§ 1911] (5) Revival of Action against Decedent. A proceeding to revive an action brought against decedent and pending at his death is not an action within the meaning of the statutes under consideration.[3]

[§ 1912] (6) Mode of Objection. The objection that an action against an executor or administrator is prematurely brought must be taken by plea in abatement.[4]

[§ 1913] (7) Waiver of Objection. It is perfectly competent for a personal representative to waive the objection that the suit is prematurely brought,[5] and such objection is waived by answering to the merits and consenting to have the case placed on the trial calendar [6] or going to trial on an answer denying the validity of the claim sued on.[7] A judgment rendered in such suit will protect the representative when pleaded in suits brought after that time,[8] and its validity cannot be questioned by a claimant of property against which it is sought to be enforced.[9] The exemption is not waived by a mere acknowledgment of service on the part of the representative, where there is no express waiver of the exemption and the representative does not file any defense.[10]

Presumption as to waiver. Where an executor permits a proceeding prematurely brought to proceed to a final decree, it will be presumed, on his application to set aside the decree on the ground that it was prematurely brought, that he intended to waive the defense unless there is proof of accident or inadvertence.[11] age, her helpfulness, and her impoverished circumstances, it was manifestly the intention of the testator that this support should begin immediately upon his decease and continue so long as she should live. In view of the age and physical condition of appellee, as portrayed by this record, how idle and perfectly futile would have been this provision for her support, if the contention of the executors be true—that she must wait until the expiration of the statutory period mentioned in the sections cited, and then only recover at the end of a litigation with the executors! Such a course would inevitably tend to, and might absolutely, defeat the purpose of the testator—a purpose so worthy and so commendable that, in our opinion, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, the executors themselves, if in doubt as to their power, should have invoked the aid of the court to enable them to carry into effect the generous impulse of the testator, the common benefactor of them all; for, in all human probability, before the tedious delays thus entailed upon appellee would have ended, she would have been removed far beyond the need of human help and beyond the fear of human niggardliness").

[§ 1914] 2. Statutes of Limitations—a. Actions by Personal Representatives—(1) General Statutes—(a) Actions Generally—aa. Causes of Action Arising in Decedent's Lifetime. Where a cause of action accruing to testator or intestate is barred by the general statute of limitations in his lifetime, his personal representative cannot recover thereon, although decedent died on the last day of the statutory period and the representative sued shortly after his death.[12] As respects causes of action arising in decedent's lifetime, but not barred by the general statute of limitations during his lifetime, his death does not interrupt the running of the statute in the absence of some statutory provision to the contrary;[13] and it has been held that the fact that the administrator is ignorant of the existence of the cause of action does not affect the rule.[14]

[§ 1915] bb. Causes of Action Arising after Decedent's Death. The generally accepted rule is that a cause of action which accrues after decedent's death is not complete and does not arise and exist so that the statute of limitations can begin to run upon it until an administrator is appointed who can bring suit.[15] The reason assigned is that no cause of action can arise and exist in favor of an administrator until he comes into existence as such.[16] It has been held, however, that the statute commences to run on the appointment and qualification of the administrator, although the decree appointing him is reversed on appeal.[17] According to the weight of authority the statute of limitations does not commence to run against the right of an executor to bring suit on a cause of action arising after testator's death until probate of the will and his qualification as executor.[18] Undue delay by reasonable diligence in procuring the appointment of an administrator may, however, bar the right of action.[19]

[a] Conversion of property. — In case of a wrongful conversion after decedent's death the statute does not begin to run until after the appointment of the administrator. The statute begins to operate only from the time the right to demand the property vests in some one. Johnson v. Wren, 3 Stew. (Ala.) 172; Haslett v. Glenn, 7 Harr. & J. (Md.) 17; Fishwick v. [f] Limitation of rule. — Where there is no administrator and no debts are shown to be due, the distributees have the right to sue for and recover the property belonging to their ancestors, and in such a case, where a suit by them would be barred by the statute of limitations a recovery by the administrator will also be barred, although there was no administrator when the cause of action accrued and none was appointed until within the period prescribed by the statute of limitations. Manly v. Kidd, 33 Miss. 141.

[g] Contrary view.—"The clause 'after the cause of action shall have accrued' does not, in our judgment, imply, in addition, the existence of a person legally competent to enforce it by suit. . . . It [the statute] must run in all cases not expressly excepted from its operation." Tynan v. Walker, 35 Cal. 634, 643, 644, 95 AmD 152.

son of the doctrine stated is sometimes prevented by statutes providing that the absence of anyone authorized to bring an action at the time when the cause of action accrues shall not extend the time for suing beyond a certain period,[19] or that limitations shall start to run at a certain time after decedent's death if no representative is appointed within such time.[20]

[§ 1916] (b) Actions by Administrator De Bonis Non. Where a statute has commenced to run against an administrator it continues to run against the administrator de bonis non,[21] and is not suspended for the period during which there is a vacancy in the administration.[22] It has accordingly been held that, where a transfer of property of an estate by an administrator has become effectual under the statutes of limitation an administrator de bonis non cannot recover such property as a part of the estate.[23] Until a disputed will is finally adjudged to be invalid no cause of action accrues to an administrator de bonis non to recover goods remaining unadministered by the executor, and the statute of limitation does not begin to run against him until that time.[24]

[§ 1917] (c) Actions to Recover Overpayments to Creditors or Legatees. Where a personal representative makes overpayments to a creditor through mistake superinduced by the fraud of the latter, the statute does not commence to run against a right to recover the overpayment until the date when the payment was made.[25] If a creditor has been paid his claim in full, under an honest belief that the estate is solvent and the estate is subsequently declared insolvent and dividends ordered to be paid from all the assets then available, the statute of limitations commences to run in an action to recover the excess from the date when the dividend was ordered.[26] The statute runs against a cause of action for money paid a legatee in excess of his legacy by mistake from the date of payment and not from the date of settling the executor's final account.[27] Where a legatee dies before the executor's claim for overpayments is barred and the executor becomes the administrator of the legatee, the statute does not run against him while he remains administrator, because he cannot sue himself and because he is not obliged to exercise the right of retainer on pain of forfeiting it within any specific time after taking out administration.[28]

[§ 1918] (d) Claims of Personal Representatives. It is usually considered that, during the period of administration, limitations does not run with respect to a claim of the representative against his decedent, for the reason that the representative cannot sue himself,[29] although there is authority for the contrary view.[30] Where one of two residuary legatees and executors left the collection of the outstanding assets entirely to the other residuary legatee and executor, under an agreement between them by which the latter was to remit a moiety when a certain specified amount was collected, and it appeared that the residue was ascertained, or could have been ascertained, within a year from the testator's death, it was held that the nonacting party's claim to what was so collected more than ten years before action brought was barred by the statute of limitations.[31]

[§ 1919] (e) Effect of Failure to Prosecute Suit. The failure of an administrator to prosecute with reasonable diligence a suit pending at decedent's death may be treated as an abandonment thereof so as to exclude him from bringing an action on the same cause of action barred by the statute of limitations subsequent to decedent's death,[32] and where, as authorized by statute, a person sues on a claim due the estate as administrator without appointment, and subsequently thereto an administrator who has been appointed refuses to prosecute, the suit will abate.[33]

[§ 1920] (f) Circumstances Suspending Running of Statute. In computing the time within which a personal representative must bring action the time during which the courts are by statute closed should be excluded,[34] and where an executor who has been ousted by means of a fraudulent will is subsequently reinstated, the time during which his functions were suspended must be excluded in estimating the period within which an action against those who perpetrated the fraud to recover property of the estate must be brought.[35] Where persons who have fraudulently secreted property of an estate for a number of years on discovery admit possession and promise to account therefor they cannot set up that the executor's claim to the property has become stale and barred by lapse of time.[36] An action by a personal representative instituted after the statutory period has elapsed has been sustained, where no plea to the jurisdiction was filed and no showing was made that the estate had been closed or that the personal representative had been discharged.[37] The statute does not commence to run against a bill by the personal representative to recover property fraudulently conveyed by decedent until a reasonable time has elapsed after evidence of the fraud is discovered,[38] and it has been considered that the time for bringing such an action runs from the time when creditors recover judgments against the estate, for payment of which the property conveyed is necessary.[39] If a right of action exists in favor of the personal representative the statute of limitations is not prevented from running against a claim in favor of the estate by the disabilities of the heirs.[40]

[§ 1921] (2) Statutes Specially Applicable to Personal Representatives. Where a claim of a decedent is not actually barred by limitations at the time of his death, the statutes usually permit the representative to sue thereon within a certain time, even though the general statute of limitations would bar the claim earlier,[41] and where the time limited by the general statutes expires before the time limited by the special statute, the action must be brought within the time limited by the latter statute.[42] But a statute which provides that if any right of action existed in favor of a decedent at the time of his death and survives, action may be brought thereon within a designated period after the grant of administration, extends the time within which suits may be brought which would be otherwise barred by the general statute of limitations and does not limit the time of bringing actions against which the statute had not run;[43] and the same is the rule under a statute providing that if a person entitled to bring an action dies before the expiration of the time limited for the commencement thereof and the cause of action survives, an action may be commenced by his representatives after the expiration of the time and within a designated period from his death.[44] Under statutes of this character suit need not be brought within the designated period after grant of administration, provided it is brought within the period fixed by the general statute of limitations,[45] the rule being that, if, at the time the special statute commences to run, there remains an unexpired portion of the general statute of greater length than the period fixed by the special statute, the general statute controls.[46] If it is provided by statute that the time which elapses between the death of a person and the grant of letters testamentary, or of administration on his estate, is not to be taken as any part of the time limited for the commencement of actions by executors or administrators, this period must be excluded in computing the time within which suit must be brought, although the statute commenced to run in the decedent's lifetime.[47] Statutes of this character contemplate the grant of permanent letters of administration. The suspension provided for does not cease upon the grant of temporary letters of administration.[48] It has been held that an action by one executor against another, brought more than the statutory period after defendant's appointment, although within the statutory period after plaintiff's appointment, cannot be maintained;[49] but it has also been considered that under a statute limiting the time within which actions against an administrator must be brought, an action by one administrator against another must be brought within the statutory period after plaintiff is entitled, under his appointment, to maintain the action.[50] Statutes requiring an administrator to sue within a designated time contemplate administration in the state of their enactment, and therefore one who qualifies as administrator and sues in that state within the statutory period is not barred, although he qualified as administrator in another state more than the statutory period before suit brought.[51] A statute extending the time for bringing actions in favor of administrators upon the happening of certain contingencies does not apply to an action brought by a party in his lifetime which was not abated or discontinued by his death or any other reason enumerated in the statute.[52]

Failure to appoint representatives. Where the statute permits actions to be brought within a certain period after the death of the person having the cause of action, the time runs regardless of the appointment of an administrator and lapse of the full period without the appointment of an administrator will bar the action,[53] and it has been held that, where the time runs from the appointment of an administrator, but the period allowed by the general statute for bringing the action expires before any administrator is appointed, the action is barred.[54]

[§ 1922] (3) Miscellaneous. Where leave to sue is necessary and is asked within the period fixed by statute for bringing suit, the motion cannot be denied on the ground of laches, for this would in effect establish a time for bringing suit different from that fixed by the statute.[55] If a surviving executor files a bill against the administratrix of his coexecutor to recover certain property inventoried as part of the coexecutor's estate, delay in filing the bill is no defense thereto if the delay was due to the action of both parties.[56] A widow who has wrongfully taken possession of a note payable to decedent and procured the debtor to give a note payable to herself in its place acquires no right to the debt evidenced by the original note and no lapse of time bars the right of the representative to sue for the amount due thereon;[57] and as to money actually collected by her on the note the statute runs from the time of its collection and she may invoke the bar of six years, no facts being shown to make her a trustee ex maleficio.[58] Where an administrator appointed seventeen years after decedent's death takes possession of land as belonging to intestate and is evicted therefrom by an intruder without title whose possession commences shortly after the grant of letters, he should not be permitted to allege that the claim of plaintiff was stale as to him.[59] The granting of an order allowing the administrator a certain time within which to move for a new trial, in a case in which a claim against a decedent is allowed, does not suspend the right of the administrator during such time to annul a conveyance by his decedent as in fraud of the creditor in whose favor the claim is allowed.[60]

[§ 1923] b. Actions against Personal Representatives—(1) Actions on Claims against Estate—(a) General Statutes—aa. In General. The general statutes of limitations apply with the same effect to causes of action against the estates of deceased persons as to causes of action against living persons,[61] and this is true whether the debt matured before or after decedent's death.[62] As between the executors and creditors of an estate no trust exists of that peculiar kind which is within the exclusive control of a court of equity, and to which the statute of limitations cannot be pleaded; the relation between them is simply that of debtor and creditor and the statute of limitations may be set up in any forum that has jurisdiction of the case, whether legal or equitable.[63]

[§ 1924] bb. Accrual of Cause of Action. A cause of action for services rendered decedent in his lifetime, compensation therefor to be made out of his estate, does not accrue until his death.[64] Where a liability accrued against a decedent's estate as surety on a bond on Jan. 15, 1894, and on Dec. 10, 1895, the obligee in the bond obtained a decree against the principal and sureties, and on July 15, 1899, the obligee intervened in a suit to settle the estate of decedent to enforce her decree, the obligee's demand was not barred by a statute providing that a right of action against the estate of a decedent which accrues after decedent's death shall not continue longer than five years after its accrual.[65]

[§ 1925] (b) Special Statutes—aa. In General. In a number of states special statutes of limitation have been enacted with respect to actions against executors and administrators on claims against decedent,[66] and as such statutes usually provide that the claim shall be forever barred unless action is brought thereon within the required time,[67] and as such it is held that they operate as an absolute bar against the recovery of the claim either from the estate or from the heirs, distributees, devisees, or legatees.[68] Such statutes are held to control the general statutes of limitation,[69] but as they are of a penal character rather than statutes of repose, they must be strictly construed, and in order to entitle the representative to the benefit thereof the statutes must be complied with in all essential respects.[70] A statute fixing a limitation period for suits against executors and administrators is not applicable to a suit against a widow in her individual capacity to recover an overpayment alleged to have been made to her by mistake as the interest of her deceased husband in the assets of a firm,[71] or to the claim of a judgment creditor of a corporation against the estate of a deceased stockholder,[72] and a limitation as to claims against a decedent's estate does not bar the wife's administrator from recovering against her deceased husband's estate an amount paid by her out of her separate estate to liquidate his indebtedness for which she was entitled to be subrogated.[73] A third person's claim against an administrator and the heirs of the estate for money paid to the administrator under a mutual mistake is not a "claim against the deceased" within the meaning of a statute prescribing the time within which a suit must be begun against an executor upon any cause of action against the deceased.[74] Where a trustee executed the bond sued on, conditioned on behalf of himself, his heirs, executors, etc., to pay over the trust fund to his successor on the termination of the trust by his death or otherwise, the special statute of limitations did not begin to run against an action on the bond against the trustee's executors until demand made for the payment of the fund.[75] Such a statute applies to claims against estates after representation of insolvency as well as before, and is an absolute bar unless suit is brought within the period limited;[76] and under a statute limiting actions against an executor for conversion by himself or his testator to three years, a suit against an executor for converting bonds, which, believing they were his testator's, he sold and applied the proceeds as part of his testator's estate, was barred after three years, although the executor was sued individually.[77]

Claims in favor of the state have been regarded as within the purview of such statute,[78] unless expressly excepted,[79] but it has also been considered that such statutes do not apply to the state unless it appears, by express language or necessary implication, that such was the legislative intent.[80]

[§ 1926] bb. Statutes Requiring Suit within Prescribed Time—(aa) In General. The statutes of the various states fixing special periods of limitation for suits against executors or administrators vary considerably in detail both in respect to the time when the statutory period shall commence to run and the duration thereof. These statutes respectively fix the period at which the statute commences to run upon the death of the testator or intestate, the granting of letters testamentary or of administration, qualification, qualification and notice of appointment, etc.[81]

[§ 1927] (bb) After Death of Decedent. Statutes requiring creditors to sue within a designated time after decedent's death apply to actions against personal representatives as well as against heirs.[82] All persons who have demands originating from contracts or agreements are considered creditors within the meaning of such a statute,[83] and a claim based on an order in the nature of a judgment of the court of another county which was never a lien upon after-acquired real estate in the county where decedent died domiciled has only the lien of a general debt on the lands of decedent in the latter county, and is subject to the limitation of a statute, requiring an action for the recovery thereof to be commenced within two years after decedent's death.[84] Statutes of this character have been held to apply to a debt, although part of it did not become due until more than the statutory period after decedent's death, if no notice of the debt was given to the personal representative within the statutory period.[85] They do not, however, apply to actions not based on an indebtedness of decedent, such as an action by a surviving partner for an accounting of debts paid by him which should have been paid by decedent,[86] to the foreclosure of a trust deed given by him,[87] or to causes of action

87. Smith v. Goodlet, 92 Tenn. 230, 21 SW 106 (the foreclosure does not take away any right which decedent accruing after his death.[88] It has been held that these statutes will not operate as a bar to creditors not suing within the period thereby fixed where there is no executor or administrator during that time;[89] but there is also authority for the view that, where a creditor has a right to take out letters of administration or procure the appointment of an administrator, after the lapse of a certain time from the death of the decedent, the special statute of limitation begins to run from the expiration of such time.[90]

Where the cause of action does not accrue until more than the statutory period after the death of the debtor and the grant of letters and the settlement of his estate, the limitation as to claims against estates will not apply to an action brought by the creditor against the administrator and heirs of the deceased debtor.[91]

A petition by a ward for the appointment of an auditor to state an account against a deceased guardian is not an "action" within the meaning of a statute providing that no debts of a decedent, except those secured by mortgage or judgment, shall remain a lien on the realty longer than five years after his decease, unless an action thereon is commenced and duly prosecuted against his personal representatives within five years after his decease;[92] and hence, where the proceeding on such petition results in an adjudication against the guardian's estate and a sale of realty by order of the orphans' court, entered more than five years after decedent's death, to pay the indebtedness, no title passes under such sale.[93]

[§ 1928] (cc) After Grant of Letters. A statute requiring suit against executors or administrators to be brought within a designated time after grant of letters testamentary or of administration applies to actions against executors who are residuary legatees and give bonds for the payment of debts and of legacies,[94] and bars an action by a bank to recover the amount of an overdraft by decedent, although, owing to a mistake in bookkeeping, the fact of such overdraft was not known to the bank until after the statutory period had expired.[95] Such a statute does not begin to run until letters of administration are actually granted, although the claimant himself is entitled to such letters,[96] but where letters are granted, the statute begins to run immediately as against a claimant having actual knowledge thereof, although the statutory notice of issuance of the letters is not given.[97] Such statutes do not apply to claims maturing after decedent's death, their operation being confined to causes of action matured and existing against decedent at the time of his death.[98]

[§ 1929] (dd) After Qualification of Representative. Under some statutes suit must be brought against a personal representative within a designated period after he has qualified,[99] and if not brought within that period they are barred.[1] These statutes run without regard to the publication of notice for creditors to file their claims.[2] Ordinarily such statutes commence to run on the qualification of the administrator and are not stopped by his subsequent resignation;[3] but where one statute exempts a representative from suit for a specified period after his qualification, and another statute provides that no suit shall be brought against him unless within a certain period after his qualification, the period prescribed by the latter statute does not commence to run until the expiration of the period of exemption.[4] Where a claim is presented to an administrator and allowed by him, but is subsequently rejected by the administrator's successor, the statute limiting actions against the administrator to a certain time after his qualification does not begin to run until the rejection of the claim,[5] but where the only action ever taken on a claim is a rejection thereof, the statutory period runs from the date of qualification of the representative and not from the date of rejection.[6] Such statutes apply to suits on judgments obtained against decedent during his lifetime,[7] but have no application to claims accruing after his death,[8] or to notes given by him which are referred to in the schedule of debts attached had from the representative, but leaves him to redeem the same as decedent might have done).

The creditor is authorized to sue where his claim, on being presented for allowance, is rejected or disallowed by the administrator, but where its validity is acknowledged, and its allowance by the administrator as a just claim against the estate is secured, no action will lie upon it. There is nothing, in such case, for the statute to operate upon. . . . Statutes of limitation affect the remedy only. They do not extinguish the debt nor affect its validity. They merely withhold from the owner thereof the right to employ remedial process for its collection; and where there is no right to such process for the statute to operate upon, where the right to resort to the courts for the collection of the debt, is taken away, the statute ought not, and was not, intended to apply").

[a] Contracts made by a personal representative, although in fulfillment of an executory contract made by decedent, are not within the meaning of the statute. Cummins v. Kennedy, 3 Litt. (Ky.) 118, 14 AmD 45.

[b] Judgments against executor.— A statute providing that no action shall be brought against an executor or administrator upon a judgment obtained against the testator or intestate, and that scire facias shall be issued to revive the same after the expiration of six years from the qualification of the executor or administrator, applies only to judgments against the testator or intestate and not to judgments against to a petition to sell real estate filed before the bar of the statute has operated.[9]

Effect of removal of creditor to or from state. Under a statute which gives residents of the state two years and nonresidents three years within which to commence suits against personal representatives, the residence of a creditor at the time of administration granted determines the bar and his subsequent removal to or from the state will not change the bar.[10]

Tax proceedings. A proceeding by the sheriff in the county court to require the personal representative of a deceased taxpayer to list property omitted from assessment is not an action within the meaning of such a statute.[11]

[§ 1930] (ee) After Qualification or Giving Bond and Notice of Appointment. Where the statute provides that a personal representative, after giving notice of his appointment, is not liable to suit by a creditor unless it is commenced within a designated period after his giving bond, the statute does not commence to run from the date on which an insufficient bond is given.[12] While it has been held that the limitation provided for by such a statute commences to run from the date of giving bond, and not from notice,[13] notice is necessary to render the statute operative,[14] and it must be in strict compliance with the terms of the statute.[15] Failure to give the notice required by such a statute does not, however, affect the running of the general statutes of limitations.[16] It is sometimes required that, where the administrator had assets and sets up the statute, he must show that he has properly administered the same,[17] but if it is ascertained that he has no assets the statute is a complete bar.[18] The allowance of further time to settle the estate does not take the case out of the operation of such a statute.[19] Where no bond is required or given, the right of the creditor to bring an action is barred on the expiration of the statutory period after time of appointment, notice having been duly given.[20] Where the right of action accrues subsequent to qualification, the statute commences to run from the date of its accrual,[21] and the same principle applies where a contingent liability becomes fixed after the qualification.[22]

Such a statute applies to suits in equity as well as to suits at law,[23] to claims on judgments against decedent,[24] to a claim by a widow for a year's support allowed her by statute,[25] to a claim under a bond to which decedent was a party arising during his lifetime,[26] to actions by a collector of taxes against the administrator,[27] and to claims in favor of the administrator himself.[28]

Such a statute has no application to claims for specific property held in trust by decedent,[29] to actions on demands against the executor individually,[30] or to a bill against an administrator who has converted complainant's property to the use of decedent's estate;[31] nor does it apply to actions which do not accrue within the period fixed thereby.[32] Where the parties were descendants of a common ancestor and plaintiff brought an action for the sale of certain family portraits, claiming an interest under a will, which defendant claimed that they passed to him with the mansion house and also by adverse possession, the suit being to determine the rights of the parties to property, the special statute limiting time of action for "claims against the estate" did not apply.[33]

In computing the time within which action may be brought the day on which the bond was given must be excluded.[34]

Shortening period of limitation. If the period prescribed by the statute is shortened by an amended statute, the original, and not the amended, statute applies to actions against representatives who gave bond before the amended statute took effect.[35] A subsequent statute excepting from the operation of the amended statute any right which had ac-

"The filing in the probate court of proof of publication of notice of appointment by an executor or administrator, required by section 6089, Revised Statute, is a mode of perpetuating the evidence of such notice, and is for the convenience and protection of the executor or administrator. It forms no part of the notice to creditors required to be given within three months after the giving of bond, and is not for the benefit of creditors. Hence, where such notice is duly given by publication within three months after the giving of bond, although proof of such publication is not filed in the probate court until after the expiration of a year from the giving of the bond, the two years' limitation within which actions may be brought provided by section 6113, Revised Statutes, will begin to run from the date of the giving of the bond." crued or existed against a decedent or his representative prior to its passage excepts from the shortened period of limitations all causes of action which accrued to the creditor prior to the passage of the act shortening the period, and which were not barred at the time of the passage of the statute creating the exception,[36] but does not revive a right of action which was barred by the amended statute prior to the enactment of the statute creating the exception.[37]

[§ 1931] (ff) After Probate or Grant of Administration and Notice of Appointment. Where a statute provides that no action shall be brought against any executor or administrator in his representative capacity after a certain time from probate of the will or grant of administration, provided notice of his appointment is given, the statutory period to be reckoned from the time of giving notice, it is of course obvious that the time commences to run from the day of notice of appointment.[38] Notice is necessary to put such a statute in operation,[39] and the notice must be published in accordance with the provisions of the statute.[40] Such a statute applies to suits in equity as well as to actions at law,[41] and to contributions decreeed to be due from the stockholders of a bank under a section of their charter making them personally liable for "all losses, deficiencies, or failure of the capital stock of said bank."[42] It does not, however, apply to a bill against an administrator not in his capacity as such but as trustee.[43] Where an indorser of a note agreed in writing to save the other indorsers harmless from all loss, costs, and expenses on account of their indorsements, and such indorser died, and, on the maturity of the note, less than three months after his death, it was renewed by all the indorsers, except decedent, the liability of decedent's estate to the other indorsers arose immediately upon the execution of the renewal note, and hence where action was not brought on such liability within the statutory period of twenty months after the filing in the probate office of notice of the appointment of an administrator, the claims were barred and were not saved by a further provision of the statute extending the time for suing upon the cause of action which did not accrue within eighteen months after the affidavit of notice was filed.[44]

Change of period. An amendatory statute shortening the period within which actions must be brought does not govern an action against an estate, the settlement of which was pending at the time of its passage.[45]

[§ 1932] (gg) After Rejection of Claim—aaa. In General. In a number of states the statutes require that, where a claim which has been presented against the estate is rejected, action thereon must be commenced within a designated time after such rejection, failing in which the claim is barred,[46] and when the bar of such a statute has once attached, no act or omission of the personal representative can revive the right of action on the claim.[47] The object of such statutes is to effect the speedy settlement of estates.[48] They are independent of, and collateral to, the general statutes of limitation,[49] and their practical effect is to bar some claims in a much less time than the general statute does, while in other cases the time may be somewhat

[a] A statute requiring action to be brought as speedily as the same can be done after disallowance of a claim against an estate represented as insolvent does not require such action to be commenced at the next succeeding term of court in all cases. The intent of the legislature is that this should be done as speedily as possible having regard to the place of residence and of the circumstances of the parties. Guild v. Hale, 15 Mass. 455.

extended.[50] It has been held that they are not statutes of limitation in the sense that the operation thereof will be suspended by constitutional provisions suspending all statutes of limitation in civil suits.[51] They are considered highly penal in their nature, must be construed with great strictness, and in order to bring a case within their provisions and to make them available to the personal representative, all the requisites of the statute must have been strictly complied with and their terms implicitly obeyed.[52]

[§ 1933] bbb. Claims to Which Statutes Applicable—(aaa) In General. Statutes of this character apply to claims arising after decedent's death as well as to claims arising in his lifetime,[53] and a claim which becomes due on presentation is a claim "then due" within the meaning of such a statute.[54] These statutes have, however, no application to claims which need not be presented for allowance,[55] or to claims arising on dealings with the personal representative.[56] Neither do they authorize suits on claims not due[57] or contingent claims.[58] A contingent claim is, however, within the meaning of a statute requiring rejected claims which are not due to be sued on within a designated time after they become due.[59]

[§ 1934] (bbb) Secured Claims. Where a claim which is secured by mortgage is rejected, the filing of a bill to foreclose the mortgage within the statutory period after rejection does not suspend the operation of the statute as to the claim itself,[60] but the short statute of limitations does not operate against an action to foreclose a mortgage or other lien on property of decedent, where no deficiency judgment is sought or granted.[61]

[§ 1935] (ccc) Claim of Guarantor for Contribution from Estate of Coguarantor. Where one of several joint and several guarantors has paid the full amount due under the guaranty, he may enforce contribution against the estate of a deceased coguarantor for a proportionate amount of what was paid, although the claim of the original creditor against decedent would be barred by the short statute of limitations.[62]

[§ 1936] ccc. Steps Necessary to Make Statute Available—(aaa) Presentation and Rejection of Claim—aaaa. In General. In order that the rejection of a claim may set the statute in motion there must have been a valid presentation[63] by the claimant or by someone duly authorized by him to make presentation,[64] and the claim so presented must have been properly authenticated.[65] The claim must be presented to, and rejected by, the personal representative,[66] or by someone whom he

[a] Extension of period.—Where decedent's note had been presented to the executors within the six months limited by the probate court therefor, and within the period fixed by the general statute (six years), an action brought within the four months prescribed by statute from rejection of the claim was not barred, although more than six years had elapsed since the right of action first accrued. [a] Sufficiency of presentation of judgment.—The presentation of an abstract of a judgment which showed its date, amount, rate of interest, and the names of the parties, and was duly authenticated, was a sufficient presentation to put in operation the limitation of actions as to rejected claims. Gaston v. McKnight, 43 Tex. 619.

[b] A presentation stating an impossible date is nugatory, and rejection thereof does not preclude claimant from presenting his claim in proper form, and its rejection thereafter starts the running of the period for bringing suit against the administrator. Lindsay v. Hogan, (Mont.) 185 P 1118.

[a] When claim sufficiently authenticated.—After a claim against an estate had been presented and rejected by the executrix, plaintiff's attorney, deeming the claim not sufficiently formal, again presented it to the executrix's attorney, who simply took the claim and said it would be again rejected and it was so rejected by the executrix. There was nothing said at the second presentation by defendant's attorney as to the informality of the first presentation or that it would be considered as not having been before rejected. It was held that the statute limiting the time of action on rejected claims began to run from the first rejection. Gillespie v. Wright, 93 Cal. 169, 28 P 862.

[a] A rejection by one of several coadministrators is sufficient. Coburn v. Harris, 53 Md. 367.

[b] Limitation of rule.—When a claim has been passed by the orphans' court and payment of the same demanded by the creditor and refused by the administrator, or one of two administrators, then an action to recover it must be begun within nine months thereafter. In such case it is not necessary that there should be a physical exhibition of the claim to the administrator in order that the statutory limitation should begin to run. But when the claim has not been passed by the orphans' court there must be a physical presentation of it properly authenticated to the administrator in order that his refusal to pay may be such as to require suit to be brought by the claimant within nine months. Bradford v. Street, 84 Md. 273, 35 A 886.

[c] Rejection by court after rejection by representative.—Where a claim is presented to the representative and rejected, and subsequently presented to the county court and rejected, the statutory period runs from the date of rejection by the representative and not from the date of rejection by the county court, the statute providing that when a claim has directed to reject the claim.[67] The rejection contemplated is one made at a time when suit could have been instituted by the claimant immediately thereafter;[68] and such a statute is not set running by a rejection by a foreign administrator,[69] or a temporary administrator who can be sued only by permission of the surrogate.[70] The rejection must be express, unequivocal, and final,[71] unless failure of the representative to act can, under the statute, be deemed a rejection.[72] It is not, however, essential that the rejection shall be in writing, but a verbal rejection is sufficient.[73] Whatever may be the language or declaration of the representative to the claimant if in the same notice or declaration or at the same time he does or says anything from which the claimant may reasonably infer that the determination to dispute or reject the claim is not final, but that it will be further examined or considered either upon the vouchers already exhibited or such as may be thereafter presented, the claim is not rejected so as to set the statute in motion.[74] The claim rejected must be the same as that sued on or the statute will not apply[75] but this does not mean that a party whose claim is rejected can evade the statute by successive presentation of claims founded on the same transaction but varying in form or detail.[76]

[§ 1937] bbbb. Failure of Representative to Act. In the absence of a statute making provision as to the effect of nonaction upon a claim, the mere failure of the representative to act upon a claim is not sufficient to set the statute running;[77] but where the statute provides that failure of the representative to act on a claim within a specified time after presentation shall be deemed a rejection, the statutory period runs from the expiration of such time where there is no affirmative rejection.[78] Where the statute provides that, if a claim is not is rejected either by the executor or administrator of a county judge suit must be brought within three months from same rejection, not contemplating the presentation of the rejected claims to the county court. Farwell v. Richardson, 10 N. D. 34, 84 NW 558.

[d] The attorney for the estate has not power to allow or reject claims, as the allowance or rejection of claims is an official act which must be performed by the executor or administrator. Cowgill v. Dinwiddie, 98 Cal. 481, 33 P 439.

67. See cases infra this note.

[a] Rejection by an attorney directed so to do is sufficient, because when the representative gives to the attorney instructions how to act, it is not a delegation of the trust but a performance of it by the representative acting through another. [a] Delay in investigating claim.—Where a claim was made out and sent to the attorney of the administrator, and the administrator suggested that certain payments had not been credited, and had his attorney investigate the matter, and asked that for a full and complete statement of the account, which was made out and sent to him or his attorney, the ten days allowed by statute for action on the claim should be computed from the presentation acted on within a certain time after presentation, the claimant may at his option deem such neglect equivalent to a rejection, the claimant is not bound to consider failure to act as a rejection, unless he chooses,[79] but may treat the proceedings as nugatory and file a new claim, thus avoiding the running of the statute.[80]

[§ 1938] cccc. Partial Rejection. Where a claim consists of independent items and the executor admits some and rejects others, the statute commences to run against the rejected items from the date of the rejection.[81] The allowance of only a portion of the claim is a sufficient rejection of the balance.[82]

[§ 1939] dddd. Rejection after Allowance. It has been held that, where a claim has been allowed by the executor or administrator, he cannot afterward reject the claim so as to set in motion the statute of limitations as to action rejected claims;[83] but it has also been considered that, where, after the allowance of a claim by an administrator, it is disallowed and rejected by his successor, the statute runs from such rejection.[84]

[§ 1940] eeee. Ground of Rejection. It has been held that in order to set the statute running, the rejection of a claim must be upon the ground that the debt, or some part of it, is not legally or equitably due.[85]

[§ 1941] (bbb) Notice of Rejection—aaaa. Necessity. The general rule is that knowledge of the rejection of a claim must be brought home to the claimant,[86] and the rejection is operative only from the time of actual notice to him,[87] although it has been held that in the absence of any statutory requirement to that effect notice of rejection is not necessary to start the statute running.[88] Where a claim against a decedent's estate was presented for allowance by agents of the claimant, who were notified of the rejection thereof, such rejection is binding on the claimant, although he was not informed thereof, or even though he was informed by his agents that the claim was not rejected.[89]

[§ 1942] bbbb. Sufficiency. The mere ministerial act of giving notice of rejection of a claim may be performed by the attorney for the estate.[90] The filing of a notice on rejection in a proceeding in a surrogate's court to which the claimant was an involuntary party does not obviate the necessity of bringing knowledge of the rejection home to her,[91] but it has been held that a written notice by an administrator rejecting a claim left at claimant's house with a person of suitable age to inform the bearer that claimant was not at home is equivalent to personal notice and sufficient to set the statute in motion.[92] Notice to the attorney of the creditor has been held sufficient,[93] but the mere fact that an attorney who had a claim against a decedent's estate for collection appeared in the proceedings in the surrogate's court in which such claim was rejected has been held insufficient to charge the claimant with notice of such rejection.[94] Where the attorney of an executor serves on the attorney of the claimant a notice of rejection of the claim and immediately mails a similar notice to the claimant, the claimant can treat the mailed notice as the notice prescribed by the statute, and an action begun within the statutory time after service of such notice is begun in time.[95]

[§ 1943] cccc. Service by Mail. In New York where notice of rejection is served by mail the time for commencement of the action is doubled,[96] and proof of actual receipt by the claimant of a notice of rejection mailed to him has been held necessary to render the bar of the statute available.[97]

[§ 1944] (ccc) Notice to Present Claims. Where a claim has been actually presented and rejected, the running of the statute is not prevented by the fact that no notice to present claims was published,[98] and a fortiori where such notice is published after rejection of the claim, the statute runs from the date of rejection and not from the date of such publication.[99]

[§ 1945] (ddd) Rule to Limit Creditors. Where a creditor was notified that his claim was disputed, but failed to bring action thereon within the statutory period, his claim was barred, although no rule to limit creditors was made until after an action on the claim was begun.[1]

[§ 1946] ddd. Computation of Time. Where the statute requires the action to be brought within a specified time "after" rejection, the day of the rejection is excluded in computing the time.[2]

[§ 1947] eee. Mode of Asserting Claim. After the lapse of the statutory period from rejection, the claimant is not only precluded from bringing direct proceedings to enforce the claim, but he cannot assert his claim as a counterclaim in an action brought by the representative.[3] The words "other remedy" in a statute providing that, unless a claimant commences an action for the recovery of his claim within six months after notice of dispute, he and all persons claiming under him are forever barred from maintaining any action on the claim, and from every other remedy to enforce payment thereof out of decedent's property, include statutory summary proceedings by an undertaker, and such proceedings cannot be maintained after the expiration of six months from notice of rejection of the claim.[4]

[§ 1948] fff. What Constitutes Commencement of Action. It has been held that an action is not commenced so as to toll the limitation prescribed by a statute requiring suit within three months after rejection of a claim, until the complaint is filed.[5]

[§ 1949] ggg. Consent to Determination by Surrogate. A statutory provision that an action on a claim rejected by an executor must be commenced within six months after rejection, unless a written consent is filed by the respective parties that the claim may be heard and determined by the surrogate on the judicial settlement of the executor's accounts, allows the claim to be litigated after the six months period only in proceedings before the surrogate, and such consent does not aid a claimant who brings an action in a court other than the surrogate's court after the statutory period has expired.[6] Under such a statute the consent may be joint as well as separate but it must be filed within six months after rejection of the claim to give jurisdiction.[7]

[§ 1950] hhh. Negotiations after Notice of Rejection. It has been held that, where an executor's notice of dispute and rejection of a claim is sufficient to start the six-months period of limitation, the fact that negotiations were carried on between the parties after rejection looking to a settlement of the claim is not sufficient to stay the running of the statute in the absence of any showing that the rejection of the claim was ever withdrawn or waived, or that claimant ever so believed, or of the period of time over which the negotiations extended, or that the claimant was either misled or prejudiced thereby.[8] But where an administrator after disallowing a claim and giving notice requested the creditor not to sue, expressing his belief that the claim would be compromised, and the creditor at the special instance and request of the administrator delayed the commencement of his suit accordingly, it was held that his conduct of the administrator was equivalent to an express declaration that he would not insist upon the disallowance and notice and justified the jury in finding a waiver.[9]

[§ 1951] iii. Absence of Representative from State. The statutes do not run in favor of a representative who as the time the action accrues and continuously thereafter resides out of the state,[10] but absence of the personal representative from the state for several months will not suspend the running of the short statute of limitations where it is not shown that he was without the state when the cause of action against him accrued.[11]

[§ 1952] (hh) After Final Settlement. Where executors had not made a final settlement and had not been discharged, and administrators with the will annexed were appointed on their death, an action against the administrators on a note executed by decedent was not barred by a statute limiting actions against personal representatives to seven years from the date of the final settlement.[12] Where executors applied to have their accounts judicially settled, a decree entered, settling their accounts, except that they were ordered to retain a certain sum with which to pay any judgment that plaintiff, claiming a legacy, might get against them, was a "judicial settlement," which started limitations running.[13]

[§ 1953] cc. Extension Statutes. In many jurisdictions there are statutes providing that if a person liable to action dies before the expiration of the time limited for action and the cause of action survives, an action thereon may be commenced against his personal representative within a specified period after the death of decedent or the grant of administration of his estate.[14] The object of such statutes is to extend, and in no case to limit, the time within which an action may be commenced;[15] so that, although an action may be brought within the period allowed by the special statute notwithstanding the expiration of the period allowed by the general statute of limitations,[16] an action brought within the period allowed by the general statute is in time, although the period allowed by the special statute has expired.[17] But if at the time the special statute commences to run, a portion of the time fixed by the general statute longer than that fixed by the special statute remains unexpired, the period fixed by the general statute controls and the special statute cannot operate to extend the time for bringing suit.[18] Of course an action brought after the expiration both of the general statutes of limitations and of the period fixed by statutes of the character under consideration is barred.[19] It has been held that a suit brought within the period fixed by the special statute is in time no matter how long the appointment had been delayed,[20] and certainly where the creditor is not entitled to apply for the appointment of an administrator for a certain time, and no administrator is appointed, the time within which the creditor could not secure an appointment should not be counted as part of the statutory period within which he may sue.[21] But where a creditor is entitled to apply for the appointment of an administrator, it has been considered that he cannot prolong the statutory period within which he may sue by failure to act, but must move with reasonable promptness to secure the appointment of an administrator, failing in which the statute will run against him notwithstanding there is no representative of the estate.[22] These statutes are applicable whether the administrator has given notice of his appointment or not,[23] and apply to suits to foreclose mortgages given to secure notes not barred by limitation when the maker died, although the personal representative is not a party thereto.[24] These special statutes do not have the effect of reviving a cause of action barred at the time of decedent's death,[25] and they apply only to cases where the general statute of limitations has commenced to run.[26]

A presentation for allowance of notes which were not barred prior to the death of the testator, within the statutory period after the issuance of letters of administration, is the commencement of an action within the meaning of the statute.[27]

[§ 1954] (c) Suspension of Operation of Statutes of Limitations—aa. Death of Decedent. Where a cause of action accrues after the death of the person against whom it lies, limitation does not begin to run until there is a grant of administration on his estate;[28] but the general rule is that the death of one against whom a cause of action has already accrued does not suspend the running of limitations until administration on his estate is taken out,[29]

S. D.—Gaston v. Gaston, 80 S. C. 157, 61 SE 393.

"It is apparent that the provisions of this section were not intended to shorten the time within which an action may be brought, under the general provisions of the statute, but were intended to extend such time in certain cases; that is, where at the time of a party's death there is not one year left of the period of limitation prescribed by the general statutes after the issuing of letters, the claimant shall have at least one year therefrom, and thus to this extent this section extends rather than shortens the period. If, however, at the time of issuing letters more than one year is left of the period of limitation prescribed by the general statute, then this statute does not shorten that period, and in such a case it has no effect whatever." although there is some authority for the contrary view,[30] and in some jurisdictions such a situation is provided for by statutes suspending the running of limitations during the period between the death of a debtor and the appointment of a representative of his estate,[31] with a further provision, in some cases, that limitations shall again begin to run at the expiration of a designated time from decedent's death without administration being taken out.[32]

[§ 1955] bb. Presentation of Claim.[33] Under some statutes it is held that the mere filing or exhibition of a claim against an estate does not interrupt the running of limitations against such claim,[34] but under other statutes it is held that limitation does not run against a claim during the period between its presentation and action thereon by the representative.[35] But presentation of a claim within the required time will not validate the claim if before presentation it was barred by the general statute of limitations.[36]

An order for an accounting of the indebtedness of an estate will suspend the running of limitations as to all creditors whose claims are asserted therein.[37]

[§ 1956] cc. A. 258, 59 P 850 (the fact that a judgment against a decedent was allowed as a claim against his estate, and the allowance filed in the clerk's office, making it a lien on decedent's real estate, within three years next before the bringing of an action to subject land held by decedent's wife to the payment thereof, on the ground that it was paid for with the husband's funds, does not stop the running of the statute of limitations, requiring bills for relief on the ground of fraud to be brought within three years after the discovery of the fraud).

[a] Illustration. — The statute does not run against a claim founded on a note and mortgage after allowance by the counsel of a deceased mortgagor. German Sav., etc., Soc. v. Hutchinson, 68 Cal. 52, 8 P 627.

[b] An allowed claim has the force of a judgment.—It stands pending the final close of the ad-

ance, and an appeal is taken from the allowance of a claim, the statute commences to run from the time of the entry of the certification of the allowance by the court to which the appeal is taken, in the court where the claim was originally presented.[39]

[§ 1957] dd. Commencement of Action. The commencement of an action within the period fixed by statute therefor stops the running of a statute of limitations,[40] and it is immaterial that a judgment thereon is not rendered within the statutory period.[41] The filing of claims with the proper officer and his indorsement thereof has been held to be the commencement of an action within statutes of limitations specially applicable to administrators or executors.[42] The commencement of proceedings by an executor for leave to sell testator's land for the payment of debts has, as regards the statute of limitations, been regarded as the commencement of an action against the testator's estate by the creditors, especially as to a claim which the executor acknowledges, and asks leave to pay;[43] but it has been held otherwise as to the pleading of a lien on land by a judgment creditor in an action by the executor to sell the land for the payment of debts.[44] Where a reference by statute stands in the place of an action, the entry of an order to refer is the commencement of an action sufficient to stop the running of the general statutes of limitations.[45] Where an action is commenced within the statutory period, amendments to cure defects of form made after the expiration of that period do not set up a new cause of action or entitle defendant to avail himself of the statute,[46] but amendments setting up a new cause of action after the expiration of the statutory period will not be permitted to save the action.[47] If through mistake of plaintiff's attorney an action is not entered, another action for the same cause commenced after the expiration of the special statutes of limitations will be barred,[48] and if plaintiff suffers a nonsuit in an action commenced within the statutory period, a subsequent action brought by him after the expiration of the statutory period will be barred.[49] So if an action against one administrator is discontinued because there are several who should be sued, a second action against all the administrators commenced after the expiration of the statute will be barred;[50] and if a suit is dismissed for champerty a new suit for the same cause of action brought after the expiration of the statutory period is barred.[51] Where a demurrer is sustained, because the remedy is in equity,[52] or a suit is dismissed for want of jurisdiction because defendant, an administrator appointed in one state, was sued by plaintiff for the same cause in the federal court of another state,[53] the action is one defeated by defect in form within a statute permitting a new suit within a year thereafter, in case a suit is defeated on this ground. Where a party de-ministration waiting payment in due course under orders of the court. Fort v. Blagg, 38 Ark. 471.

[c] What is not a sufficient allowance.—Under a statute requiring the clerk upon the receipt of the prescribed affidavit and the claim and its approval by him to indorse thereon the words, "Probated, allowed for $—— and registered and to sign his name officially thereto, an indorsement that the claim is 'allowed and registered,'" is insufficient to stop the running of the statute. Cheairs v. Cheairs, 81 Miss. 662, 33 S 414, 60 LRA 549.

[d] Approval by the probate judge before expiration of the period of limitations is necessary to prevent the running of limitations against the claim. Mere allowance by the administrator does not have this effect. Danzey v. Swinney, 7 Tex. 617.

[a] Where suit by legatee inures to benefit of other legatees.—Where on a bill by legatees against an executor and other legatees for settlement and distribution a decree is made ordering payment to complainants of the amounts due them and allowing legatees who were defendants to propound their claims by petition, which they do, the running of the statute as to them is suspended by the filing of the original bill. [a] Filing of a claim with the commissioners of a insolvent estate is equivalent to the commencement of an action wherein the meaning of the statute limiting actions in certain cases to two years after letters testamentary or of administration are granted. Guild v. Hale, 15 Mass. 455.

[b] Time of filing and action upon claim.—"The filing of a claim in the probate court, if it may be regarded as the commencement of a suit, so as to prevent the running of the statute of limitations, must be at the time fixed by the administrators for filing claims for adjustment. And it must also be followed by an adjudication at that term, or be regularly continued from term to term until it is passed upon by the court. If it is not so acted upon or continued, a discontinuance takes place, and the cause is no longer in that court. Propst v. Meadows, 13 Ill. 157. fendant dies during the pendency of an action, no change in the form of the proceedings will cause plaintiff to lose the benefit of his lis pendens and authorize defendant's representatives to set up the bar of the statute where decedent could not have done so.[54]

[§ 1958] ee. Statutes Exempting Representatives from Suit. Where a statute exempts personal representatives from suit for a designated time;[55] such period must be excluded in estimating the time within which an action against the personal representatives must be commenced.[56] Such suspension applies only where the action is against the representative as such,[57] and seeks to fasten or establish a liability on or against property of decedent.[58] But the suspension has been held to apply to claims which had been duly presented and were existing at the time of the adoption of the statutes,[59] and to actions for the recovery of land.[60]

[§ 1959] ff. Statutes Fixing Time for Presentation of Claims. A statute fixing the time within which claims against the estate of a decedent must be filed does not suspend the general statute of limitations for the full period allowed for the filing of claims, at least where another statute extends, for a shorter period, the time for bringing actions in case of the death of the party to be charged.[61]

[§ 1960] gg. [a] Promise must be supported by consideration.—Forney v. Benedict, 5 Pa. 225.

[b] Promise to pay when assets realized.—Under St. (1903) § 2552, providing that the limitation period prescribed with respect to sureties shall not apply to a period during which the surety obstructs or hinders suit, an executor of a surety who induces the creditor to stay suit and not to file a claim against the estate in reliance on the surety's promises that the amount due him will be paid in full on the realization of sufficient assets cannot rely on limitations prescribed for sureties in order to defeat such creditor's claims. Hamilton v. Wright, 87 SW 1093, 27 KyL 1144.

[c] Right of administrator to sue on acknowledged claims.—An administrator who has admitted claims made against the estate of his intestate before they were barred by the special statute of limitations and has agreed with such creditors to bring a suit for their benefit to recover back a gift causa mortis of the intestate may bring such suit after the expiration of such period of limitation. Chase v. Redding, 13 Gray (Mass.) 418.

[d] Right to waive bar of statute and right to acknowledge subsisting debt distinguished.—There is a plain distinction between the right of an executor to revive an indebtedness against his testator's estate, which had been extinguished by law, and his right to acknowledge, and to keep in force, a subsisting obliga-

a contrary rule prevails in a few jurisdictions.[63] A part payment by the representative, before the claim has become barred, fixes a new date from which the entire statutory period must run before the claim will become barred,[64] although no promise to pay the balance is made.[65]

Requisites and sufficiency. In order to be effective, the acknowledgment, promise of payment, or part payment must be made by the personal representative himself,[66] at a time when he was such representative,[67] and to the creditor or someone lawfully acting in his behalf.[68] It is also necessary that the acknowledgment or promise should be clear and unequivocal,[69] although it is not essential that it should be in writing.[70]

By one of several representatives. It has been held that a promise to pay or part payment by one of two or more personal representatives will arrest the running of the statute,[71] but there is also authority for the view that it will not have this effect,[72] except where the one promising afterward becomes sole representative of the estate.[73]

[§ 1961] hh. Absence of Representative from State. Where special provision is made for bringing actions against personal representatives absent from the state, their absence does not interrupt the running of the statute of limitations;[74] and, independently of any statutory provision on the subject, it has been held that absence of the executor from the state after rejection of a claim does not excuse the creditor's failure to sue him within the time limited by law.[75] A statute excluding a period of nonresidence and absence of defendant from the state from the time within which actions must be commenced has been held to apply to actions against administrators on rejected claims;[76] and a statute providing that, after any cause of action shall accrue, if the person against whom it has accrued tion, by making payments from time to time upon the principal of the debt, or by way of keeping down the interest. In one case he in effect creates an indebtedness, while in the other he is performing a moral obligation and is executing a duty recognized by law. Holly v. Gibbons, 176 N. Y. 520, 68 NE 889, 98 AmSR 694, 177 N. Y. 401, 69 NE 731 [rev 67 App. Div. 628, 74 NYS 1132].

[e] Promise binding only as to personal estate.—"The fact that the executor made payment on the claim would stop the running of the statute as to him, but a promise by him to pay the debt would only bind the personal estate in his hands. It would not affect the devisees; for the executor was without power to bind them, the title to the land passing under the will directly to the devisees." Withers v. Withers, 100 SW 253, 254, 30 KyL 1099.

[f] Time running from happening of contingency.—Where creditors of an estate were told by the executor that their claims would be paid when the real estate was sold, the statute of limitations did not run against such debts until the time of the sale of the real estate. Matter of Prince, 56 Misc. 222, 107 NYS 296, 6 Mills Surr. 255 (where all the real and personal estate was given to the executors in trust for the payment of debts, etc., with a direction to sell at such time as would in their judgment be to the best interest of the estate).

shall be absent from and reside out of the state, the period of his absence or residence out of the state shall be excluded in computing the statutory period of limitations has been held to apply to an action against an administrator who removes from the state before expiration of the limited time, although the action accrued against decedent in his lifetime.[77] But it has been held that absence of the representative from the state will not affect the running of the statute if the suit could be prosecuted against the heirs within the state and the representative made a party by publication.[78]

[§ 1962] ii. Absence of Decedent from State at Time of Death. Although at the time of a decedent's death limitation was not running in his favor, because of his absence from the state,[79] his decease sets the statute in motion,[80] unless he was absent when the cause of action accrued, so that limitations never began to run, in which case the period commences when administration is granted.[81]

[§ 1963] jj. Absence of Claimant from State. If a statute contains a saving clause in favor of persons living out of the state, the disability is removed by coming into the state even for temporary purposes, provided the debtor at that time is within the state.[82] Failure of a nonresident of the state to sue on a claim within the statutory period cannot operate as a bar, where he received no notice of intestate's death or appointment of an administrator until immediately before bringing suit, and it appears that the administrator had not settled the estate and had assets to pay all claims against it;[83] these facts constitute "peculiar circumstances entitling the claimant to equitable relief" within a statutory exception.[84]

[§ 1964] kk. Disability of Claimant. If the statutes of limitations for bringing actions against personal representatives contain no exception in favor of persons under disability, a claim of a person under disability not sued on within the statutory period will be barred.[85]

[§ 1965] ll. Vacancy in Office of Representative. The general rule is that, where administration has once been granted, a subsequent vacancy in the office of the executor or administrator does not affect the running of limitations,[86] unless the first grant of letters was void.[87] But provision is sometimes made by statute for an extension of time for bringing suit, where a vacancy in the administration occurs,[88] and it has been held that, where the appointment of an administrator is revoked by the probate court, but on appeal the administrator is restored to his office and duties, the period during which he was suspended from his office is to be deducted in computing the time allowed for the bringing of an action against him as such administrator.[89]

[§ 1966] mm. Miscellaneous. The running of the statutes has been held to be suspended by an appeal from the decree appointing the personal representative,[90] by an order of injunction issued in a suit by the administrator for a settlement of the estate preventing creditors from suing,[91] or where plaintiff puts in his claim immediately and keeps it up by a regular correspondence and demand of payment, although the statutory period elapses before suit is brought.[92] But it has been held that no suspension of the running of the statute results from the institution of insolvency proceedings,[93] the pendency of an action to settle the estate if creditors are not restrained from suit by injunction,[94] an unreasonable delay on the part of the personal representative to make objection to the claim presented to him,[95] the fact that the administrator made dis-

Green, 3 KyL 253 (an order of court enjoining creditors from proceeding at law to compel the payment of their claims, made in a proceeding by an administrator for the settlement of an estate as an insolvent estate, does not prevent limitations from running against claims filed in the action and not properly verified).

tribution after he had notice of plaintiff's claim,[96] or failure of the creditors to institute proceedings to compel sale of real estate until after the administrator had rendered an account.[97] A clause in a will directing all of testator's debts to be paid and appropriating therefor the rents of his real estate does not take the case at law out of the statutes of limitations where plaintiff does not seek his remedy under the will.[98] Ignorance of the fact that a conveyance made by decedent was in fraud of creditors does not avoid the bar of the statute.[99] The fact that a creditor lives outside of the county in which the will is proved and notice of appointment of executors published does not excuse failure to sue the executors within the statutory period.[1] Where a member of a firm dies, and the surviving partner becomes insolvent and makes an assignment for the benefit of creditors, the holder of a firm note may proceed against the estate of decedent without first bringing an action against the survivor; and so in such case the running of limitations in favor of decedent's estate is not stayed.[2]

[§ 1967] (d) Waiver of Bar of Limitations—aa. General Statutes. The question whether an executor or administrator has power to waive the general statute of limitations has already been discussed in this treatise.[3]

[§ 1968] bb. Special Statutes—(aa) General Rule. As the usual effect of a failure to observe the requirements of statutes limiting the time for presenting claims against the estate of a decedent,[4] or for bringing action against executors or administrators,[5] is to bar the right as well as the remedy, the bar created by these statutes cannot be waived by the personal representatives.[6] The creditor is bound to obey the plain requirements of the statutes,[7] and the fact that he fails to present a claim in reliance on an agreement which the administrator had not the power to make is a mistake of law on his part for which the courts furnish no relief.[8] If the executor or administrator neglects to plead the statute and thereby judgment is recovered in an action brought after the debt is legally barred, or if he voluntarily pays the debt, it is held to be in his own wrong and he cannot claim to be reimbursed from the estate.[9]

[§ 1969] (bb) Statutory Exceptions to Rule. In some jurisdictions the statutes fixing the period within which suit must be brought on claims against the estate contain provisos excepting the claimant from the operation of the statute where he delays commencement of his action at the special request of the personal representative.[10] In order that the claimant may have the benefit of this exception the request must be made by the personal representative himself,[11] within the statutory period,[12] and it must stipulate for a definite time of indulgence, or until the happening of a designated event which may occur and thereby render the period certain.[13] If on request suit is delayed for a speci-

"The general statute of limitations applies to the remedy only, and the debt, after it is barred, may be revived by a new promise, part payment, etc., but the statute of nonclaim applies to the right, and, when the claim is barred by it, it is forever barred. No promise of the executor or administrator, made in any form, can revive the claim. It is not within their power to allow a demand after the expiration of the two years. The policy of the statute forbids it. The statute need not be pleaded, but the executor or administrator may insist on the bar, at any time before final judgment." Hill v. [a] Delay until certain event.—The definite time may as well be the time which might elapse until the fied time the creditor must sue within the statutory period after the expiration of that time.[14] So the request only stops the running of the special statute of limitations and has no effect on the general statute.[15] An offer by the personal representative to refer a disputed claim to arbitration which is accepted within the period limited for bringing suit thereon and followed by a submission may operate as a waiver of the statute,[16] but it is otherwise as to a mere offer by an executor to refer a claim after an unqualified refusal to pay it.[17] Where the parties agree that the claim shall be submitted to the surrogate for hearing and determination upon the judicial settlement of the accounts of the representative, the short statute of limitations becomes inapplicable to a determination in this particular manner.[18]

[§ 1970] (e) Statutes Saving Claims Barred by Limitations—aa. In General. The statutes of some states provide in effect that judgment may be rendered against a personal representative notwithstanding the statutory limitation, if the court thinks justice and equity require it and that the creditor is not chargeable with culpable neglect in not prosecuting his claim within the time limited therefor.[19] The operation of these statutes is not limited to cases where the failure to sue seasonably was due to such fraud, accident, or mistake as would be ground for equitable relief if there was no such statute,[20] and a creditor whose delay is caused by his ignorance of a fact which he did not know existed and which he had reasonable ground to believe did not exist is not chargeable with culpable neglect within the meaning of the statute.[21] Such also is the rule with respect to delay agreed to by all parties interested in the estate, including heirs and creditors.[22] But a creditor is not entitled to relief where he has refrained from bringing suit within the time limited at the suggestion of the administrator and in reliance on statements made in good faith by him,[23] or where his delay in bringing suit is merely the result of his ignorance of the limitation of actions against personal representatives,[24] or is not caused by accident or mistake or by the practice of fraud or imposition.[25] These statutes have been held to apply not only to claims which might have been sued on within the time limited by statute, but also to contingent claims which could not have been sued on but which might have been presented and to claims which come into existence after the expiration of the statutory period,[26] but they do not apply to claims barred by the statute of limitations at the time of their passage,[27] or which would not have been enforceable against the representative if action had been brought thereon within the statutory period.[28] The question of culpable neglect is one of fact to be determined by the trial court[29] whose decision thereon is not subject to review.[30]

[§ 1971] bb. Receipt of New Assets by Personal Representative. In some jurisdictions statutes which provide the period of limitations for suit against personal representatives make an exception in the case of discovery and receipt of new assets by the representative after the expiration of the statutory period.[31] In such event the bar of the statute is removed and the estate reopened so that any creditor,[32] even though he has not proved his claim within the statutory period,[33] may come in and assert his claim as against such new assets.[34] The limitation commences to run from the time of the receipt of the new assets,[35] and if the suit is not brought within the time limited thereafter the claim is conclusively barred.[36] Property recovered by an administrator after the expiration of the statutory period by setting aside a fraudulent conveyance of personal representative could accomplish a certain event as for a particular length of time named. Puckett v. James, 2 Humphr. (Tenn.) 565.

[b] There is a sufficient request where representative asks for delay until: (1) The representative collects the debts of the estate. McKizzack v. Smith, 1 Sneed (Tenn.) 470. (2) The representative has settled with another creditor. State v. Murray, 9 Baxt. (Tenn.) 209. (3) Land bought by decedent has been paid for. Puckett v. James, 2 Humphr. (Tenn.) 565.

[c] Insufficient requests.—(1) A general request to creditors of the estate for delay from time to time. Langham v. Baker, 5 Baxt. (Tenn.) 701. (2) A statement on presentation of the claim "hold on, your claim is good." Chestnutt v. McBride, 1 Heisk. (Tenn.) 389. (3) A payment of part of the debt and a promise "to pay the balance soon." Trott v. West, Meigs (Tenn.) 163, 9 Yerg. (Tenn.) 433. (4) Where a claimant against an estate had a settlement with the administrator who agreed on the correctness of the claim and he subsequently moved out of the county and was notified by the administrator that he had lost the claim and that it would have to be proved and filed with the clerk and the claimant then wrote the administrator to send him a memorandum, these circumstances were not sufficient to excuse the failure to file the claim within two years and six months after the appointment of the administrator as required by statute. decedent is new assets within the rule,[37] as is also land redeemed by an executrix from a deed absolute in form but held by the court to be a mortgage.[38] On the other hand the following have been held not new assets: Property received by an administrator de bonis non in settlement of a suit against the surety on the bond of his predecessor for failure to account for inventoried property;[39] money arising from the sale of land possessed by the decedent at the time of his death and sold for the payment of debts, and money received by the administrator from the guardian of the heirs of the intestate under an arrangement made to save their lands from sale;[40] proceeds of a mortgage given by the heirs at law without leave of court on lands of which their intestate ancestor died seized;[41] and money accruing from inventoried patent rights, either as royalties or as proceeds of sales of such rights.[42] The fact that a note fraudulently given in settlement of certain other notes is set out in the inventory while the other notes are omitted does not make the proceeds of such notes afterward coming into the executor's hands new assets.[43] The collection, by an administrator de bonis non with the will annexed, of a fund over which a general power of appointment was given testator by his mother, and conversion of such fund into cash, was not collection of "new assets" within such a statute.[44]

[§ 1972] (2) Actions for Legacies or Distributive Shares.[45] While it is held in some jurisdictions that the statute of limitations may avail to bar an action or suit by a legatee or distributee, against the personal representative for his share of the estate,[46] the preponderance of authority supports the view that a statute of limitations, whether general or special, does not run in favor of an executor or administrator with respect to claims for legacies or distributive shares,[47] for the reason that the relation of the personal representative and the legatee or distributee is that of trustee and cestui que trust, in a direct and continuing trust and therefore the personal representative's possession cannot be adverse so long as this relation exists;[48] but the rule ceases when the reason therefor ceases to exist, and consequently the statute is available to an executor or administrator against the claim of a legatee or distributee, when he does some act purporting to be an execution of the trust, for he thereby divests himself of his character as trustee and thenceforth stands in an adverse relation to the cestui que trust.[49] To put the statute in operation, there must be a final settlement or at least a disavowal of the

To so hold would be to offer a reward to executors and administrators to be dilatory instead of diligent in the performance of their duties. Nevertheless, we are not to be understood as saying that there may not be cases in which, after an actual suspension of the trust, there has been such long acquiescence or delay on the part of the cestui que trust as to require the court to deny him relief upon the ground of laches." trust.[50] It is usually held that, on final settlement by an executor or administrator, the statute of limitations commences to run in his favor against claims of legatees and distributees,[51] although this has been denied;[52] and it has been held that the statute does not begin to run in favor of a personal representative against the distributees until an order of a court having jurisdiction directing a delivery of the estate to the distributees.[53] It may also happen that, without any final settlement or any act purporting to be in execution of the trust, the representative may set up a claim adverse to that of the legatee or distributee, in which case the statute is operative from the time the adverse claim is made known to the latter,[54] but notice to him is necessary;[55] and this notice must be actual or the acts or declarations of the personal representative must be so notorious and unequivocal as to raise a presumption of notice.[56] So where an administrator who acknowledges a balance due is removed, and an administrator de bonis non appointed, the statute commences to run against the claims of heirs against the administrator from the time of the removal, in the absence of any concealment or disability on their part.[57]

[§ 1973] (3) Actions Based on Misconduct of Representative. An action on a claim against an executor or administrator arising out of his misfeasance or neglect in connection with the administration of the estate must be brought within the period allowed by the statute of limitations.[58] If the claim is based on negligence in respect to collecting a debt, the statute runs from the time of the loss.[59] The statutory period runs in favor of the representative from the date of his discharge where he has, without concealment of the circumstances of the sale, purchased land of decedent at a judicial sale thereof,[60] or where, having purchased land for the estate, taking title as administrator, he continues in possession, under a claim of title in himself, after discharge on final settlement.[61] But limitations do not run as against an action by those entitled to the estate to recover the property thereof from the representative until he had done some open and unequivocal act showing an intention to assert in himself a title adverse to that of the persons beneficially interested.[62] Where an administrator rents land improperly allotted to intestate's widow and occupies it while administrator, he cannot, in a suit against him by a succeeding representative to recover possession, set up adverse possession during the time he was administrator.[63] If he assumes as

[a] Effect of making return subsequent to settlement.—Where the statute is set in motion by final settlement, the fact that the administrator makes a return subsequent to the settlement in which he states matters occurring before the settlement, the payments made at that settlement, but nothing which happened afterward does not amount to an admission sufficient to take an action against him, by the heirs out of the statute of limitation. Walker v. Wootten, 18 Ga. 119.

[a] Purchase of property of estate.—If the administrator buys in personal property of the estate at a sale thereof, and thenceforth openly and notoriously asserts title in himself, the statute of limitations will bar a bill brought by the heirs for relief after the action was barred at law. Wilmerding v. Russ, 33 Conn. 67; Keeton v. Keeton, 20 Mo. 530.

[b] Limitation fixed by special statute.—(1) An action against an administrator for personal liability incurred by mismanagement of the estates must be brought within five years from the time of his discharge. Gadsden v. Jones, 1 Fla. 332. (2) The limitation of a statute providing that an action against an administrator for malfeasance must be brought within a year from the time of final settlement does not apply to an action by an administrator de bonis non against an original administrator to recover an amount alleged to have been charged to defendant in his final account, since the final accounting intended by the statute is not the last accounting of successive representatives before the final settlement of the estate. Bartels v. Gove, 4 Wash. 632, 30 P 675.

[c] Actions by judgment creditors.—An action by a judgment creditor of decedent to reach assets misapplied by the administrator in order that they may be applied in due course of administration must be brought during the time limited by statute for bringing actions on judgments. agent for the heirs to collect rents and apply them in payment of decedent's debts in exoneration of the land and fails so to apply the rents, he cannot set up the statute of limitations unless there is a demand and refusal, and then only from the time thereof.[64] A plea of a statute providing that actions of assumpsit or debt grounded upon any lending or contract without specialty shall be commenced within five years is not good in bar of an action against the personal representative of a personal representative for a devastavit committed by the latter.[65] When an action is brought against an executor or administrator for a devastavit, and a judgment is obtained against him, the cause of action accrues at the time of the qualification and the limitation in force at the time governs;[66] but when the action is brought after the death of the executor, the cause of action accrues as against his real and personal representative, when such representative qualifies and gives notice to creditors, and is governed by the limitation then in force.[67] Where a judgment is rendered for plaintiff in an action against a representative for a devastavit, a further action by plaintiff to subject real estate to the payment of the judgment cannot be treated as an equitable continuation, or writ of execution on the judgment, so as to avoid the bar of the statute of limitations.[68]

[§ 1974] (4) Actions to Set Aside Settlement for Mistake or Fraud. Under a statute authorizing any person interested in the estate to have a settlement thereof set aside for mistake or fraud within three years after settlement, if a settlement should be made without in some manner finally disposing of debts against the estate within the knowledge of the administrator the creditors will be barred from any further action against the administrator after three years.[69] But persons under disabilities are not barred by their failure to except to an administrator's settlement, but may be heard on a question of fraud after the removal of their disabilities.[70]

[§ 1975] (5) Actions against Representative and Coöbligor of Decedent. Where suit is brought against an obligor and the representative of a deceased coöbligor, the fact that the suit is barred as to the latter by some statute specially applicable to suits against executors and administrators does not prevent the recovery of a judgment against the former.[71] Where an administrator is sued on a joint and several obligation with the surviving obligor, they are in respect of the application of the statute of limitations to be regarded as if they had been sued separately, and the time during which suits cannot be brought against an administrator must be added to the period fixed by the general statute before the statute can be made a bar as to his liability.[72]

[§ 1976] (6) Assertion of Claim in Suit in Which Estate Is Being Administered. In courts of equity, a creditor has the right to assert his claim against a decedent in a suit in which the estate of such decedent is being administered at any time before the assets of the estate have been disbursed.[73]

[§ 1977] 3. Laches—a. Claims of Creditors. No delay short of the time fixed by some special statute of limitations will bar a creditor seeking the enforcement of a claim against the estate which is not barred by a general statute of limitations; so long as he pursues the remedies pointed out by law within the time it prescribes he is entitled to the aid of the courts in the enforcement of his demand.[74] It has also been held that a proceeding instituted in the probate court to subject the real estate to the payment of debts, brought within nine months from the time of the expiration of the time for the filing of claims, is diligently brought, and the defense of laches will not lie.[75] On the other hand there are cases in which a claimant has delayed seeking to enforce his claim for a long time, usually considerably exceeding the statutory period of limitation, in which the court had denied relief upon the ground that the claimant's rights had been lost by laches.[76]

[a] Illustrations.—(1) Twenty years' delay will bar a creditor. Goodrum v. Mitchell, 143 Ill. A. 134 [aff 236 Ill. 183, 86 NE 217]. (2) Failure of a mortgagee having ample security at the death of the mortgagor and at the time of filing the account of his administrator showing distribution to the creditors then existing to make any effort to enforce payment on his claim until nearly eight years thereafter, when the mortgaged tract had decreased in value, and the remaining unencumbered tracts had been sold by the heirs to bona fide purchasers, constitutes laches which will estop the mortgagee and his assignee from asserting any claim against the holders of the unencumbered lands. Kemper v. Appollo Bldg., etc., Co., 30 Oh. Cir. Ct. 700.

[b] Circumstances not showing laches.—Plaintiff and her husband agreed to separate and to return all community property held by them to two men appointed to divide the same between them. The husband did not return a sum of money belonging to the community deposited in a bank, and subsequently transferred all his property to defendant's intestate, who was appointed the husband's executor and was subsequently discharged because he found no property belonging to the estate. Plaintiff did not discover the fraud of her husband in concealing the bank deposit for thirteen years after the settlement, and made no effort during that time to ascertain the facts. She discovered the fraud shortly before the death of defendant's intestate, but delayed the presentation of her claim against the estate of her husband until after the death of defendant's intestate. The deed by which her husband conveyed the property to defendant's intestate was in consideration of love and affection only. It was not shown that defendant's intestate knew anything about the facts existing at the Action for devastavit. Mere delay of a creditor in presenting his demand for payment does not preclude him from suing the representative for a devastavit, and the fact that the personal representative has distributed the estate does not relieve him of liability to a creditor who sues within the period fixed by statute.[77]

[§ 1978] b. Claims of Legatees or Distributees. While statutes of limitations are ordinarily inoperative to bar a claim for a legacy or distributive share,[78] a legatee or distributee may lose his right to enforce payment against the personal representative by his laches in failing to assert his rights for such period of time as raises a presumption of satisfaction or payment.[79] Stale demands are unwillingly countenanced in courts.[80] Interference in behalf of those who sleep on their rights, or who procrastinate them until evidence has passed away is reluctantly awarded, even where there is no statutory bar.[81] A lapse of twenty years or over from the time the legacy or distributive share becomes payable raises a presumption of payment or satisfaction and unless rebutted bars the claim.[82] Nevertheless the presumption may be rebutted and the liability to account will then remain in full force.[83] If the delay is satisfactorily explained and the presumption of satisfaction sufficiently removed, the equity of the claimant remains unaffected,[84] and where there is any evidence to rebut the presumption of payment the sufficiency of the evidence is a question of fact to be determined by the jury.[85] On the other hand if no evidence is given to repel the presumption the court should instruct the jury that they are bound by it.[86]

[§ 1979] J. Parties—1. In General. As a general rule, so far as personalty is concerned, the executor or administrator represents the estate and those who are beneficially interested therein, and hence he may sue in his own name, without joining legatees or distributees, to protect the interests of the estate,[87] and conversely, an action to enforce any liability of decedent is properly brought against his personal representatives without joining those who are beneficially interested.[88] Nevertheless those who are beneficially interested may appear to protect their own rights where such rights are jeopardized by reason of collusion with the personal representative.[89]

The public administrator commencing an action under a premature reference to him of an estate cannot amend the petition to show a later reference to him.[90]

[§ 1980] 2. Actions Relating to Personalty. The personal representative is the proper party to sue in relation to the personal estate, both at law and in equity,[91] and it is in general improper to time of the separation. Plaintiff, after defendant's intestate had been discharged as executor, was appointed administratrix cum testamento annexo, and had her claim for a portion of the bank deposit allowed, and within three years after discovering the fraud of her husband in concealing the bank deposit sued to set aside the conveyance by her husband of real estate to defendant's intestate. It was held that her action was not barred by laches, there being nothing tending to show that the heirs of defendant's intestate, nor any creditors interested in the estate, had suffered prejudice by delay in presenting the claim. Clift v. Newell, 102 SW 832, 31 KyL 486.

join as parties other persons having ultimate rights in the estate.[92] Thus the personal representative is the proper party to bring a suit for the collection of debts due the estate, and it is improper to join heirs, devisees, or legatees as parties to the suit;[93] and where a son, by means of fraud, induced his father to transfer personalty to him, and after the father's death retained possession and proceeded to administer the property for his own benefit, the administrator of the father, and not the heirs, was entitled to sue the son for conversion of the property, although the heirs were adults and there were no debts.[94] The executor or administrator is the proper party to bring an action for injuries to personal property of the estate,[95] or to protect it from sale on execution issued on a judgment against himself personally,[96] or to recover property exempt from execution belonging to intestate and wrongfully withheld.[97] Where land has been sold, the personal representative of the vendor may collect the purchase money by an action, without joining the heirs at law.[98] In a suit by an administrator de bonis non against the former administrator to recover personal property of the estate, the heirs or distributees need not be made parties,[99] and where an administrator with the will annexed sues to compel the executor of the deceased husband of the testatrix acting as executor of testatrix to account for property coming into his hands from the estate of testatrix and left unadministered, he need not make the legatees parties.[1] Where testator bequeathed his interest in a firm to his wife, remainder to his children, she was not a necessary party to a suit by testator's administrator with the will annexed for an accounting of his interest in the firm.[2] The executor eo nomine is a necessary party defendant to a bill praying a decree that will deprive him of title to the personal estate,[3] and also to a bill to establish an equitable lien on funds of the estate.[4] The heirs are not necessary parties to a foreclosure of a mortgage of personal property belonging to the estate.[5]

Exceptions and limitations of rule. The general rule, as stated, is subject to some exceptions. Thus a creditor of deceased may under peculiar circumstances, such as fraud or collusion on the part of the personal representative, bring suit against a debtor to the estate,[6] and where an administrator makes a settlement of a matter in litigation which is prejudicial to the substantial rights of the heir at law and not such as properly protects his interest or which is entered into collusively and in fraud of his rights and without his consent, the court may properly permit the heir at law to be substituted to prosecute the action in his own name.[7] If an administrator sues to recover on a note given to a former administrator of the same estate, the court can order the latter to be made a party if necessary to a proper determination of the case.[8] Where a decree of distribution of the estate of a decedent was reversed, a company which had transferred shares of stock belonging to the estate to a distributee is a proper party defendant to an action by the executors to recover such shares and to cancel the transfer thereof.[9] Where the estate has been fully partitioned and the executor discharged, he is not a proper party to an action on an account brought by one to whom it had been allotted on the partition.[10] Where prior to the attempted foreclosure of a trust deed in the nature of a chattel mortgage, the beneficiary died and no administrator or executor was appointed for her estate, her heirs were the only necessary and proper parties to a suit to restrain such foreclosure.[11] When provided by

But compare Phillips v. Threadgill, 37 Ala. 93 (the administrator is a necessary party to a bill filed by distributees against a person in adverse possession of personal property alleged to belong to the estate. There is nothing in this case to show why the court thought the distributees entitled to sue at all).

statute that one claiming an adverse interest, or who is a necessary party to a complete determination, may be made a defendant, and that the court may determine any controversy where it can be done without prejudice to the rights of others, in a suit by an administratrix against a bank to recover intestate's deposit, a claimant in possession of the pass book is a proper party defendant.[12]

Refusal of representative to sue.[13] A creditor may maintain a bill when the personal representative refuses to sue,[14] and where, in an action to recover for bank stock of a decedent's estate, alleged to have been converted, a brother of decedent, who was an heir at law and remainderman, was not joined, the petition was held subject to special demurrer on the ground of a defect of parties.[15] Where an administrator makes a fraudulent transfer of property belonging to the estate and refuses to bring suit for its recovery, it has been held that the heirs may do so.[16]

[§ 1981] 3. Joining Representative as Party Defendant on Refusal to Sue. An exception to the rule that an action to recover assets can be brought only by the personal representative arises where such representative is derelict in the performance of his duty, in which case the next of kin may maintain the action, joining the administrator as a party defendant.[17] In a case where a residuary legatee sued the executrix of the testator and others, alleging that the executrix had intrusted moneys of the estate to one since deceased, who invested it in her own name and attempted to dispose of it by will, and that the executrix refused to sue to recover the same for the estate, it was held that in such an action the executrix was a necessary and proper party.[18]

[§ 1982] 4. Actions by Creditors of Estate—a. Plaintiffs. A husband and wife who rendered services to the wife's parent under an implied agreement for compensation may join in an action against his estate to enforce such contract.[19] A suit in equity for an accounting for property wrongfully withheld from an estate cannot be maintained by a creditor alone, but the legal representative of the decedent is an indispensable party.[20] Where heirs and devisees are seeking to hold the executor liable for mismanagement of the estate, they may be joined as plaintiffs in a creditor's bill.[21]

[§ 1983] b. Defendants—(1) In General. In actions or suits by creditors to enforce claims against the estate, the general rule is that the personal representative is the only necessary or even proper party defendant.[22] Accordingly plaintiff should not join as defendants the widow[23] or heirs[24] or legatees,[25] unless their legacies have been paid and there is a deficiency of assets,[26] or residuary legatees, unless the interests of the executor are adverse to them and their rights may be prejudiced,[27] or distributees,[28] or devisees,[29] or persons to whom decedent conveyed property in trust to convert into money and pay his creditors and to account for any surplus to decedent or his legal representatives,[30] or debtors to the estate.[31] A debtor to the estate may, however, be joined as a defendant in case of collusion between the personal representative and the debtor, or insolvency of the personal representative, or unwillingness to proceed to collect the assets,[32] although in no event can a creditor sue a debtor of the estate without making the personal representative a party.[33] Where a debt for the benefit of the estate is contracted by an executor who is insolvent, the debtor bringing action against the trust estate should make the executor, as well as the cestui que trust, parties.[34] The heirs may be permitted to come in and defend if the personal representative refuses or neglects to do so.[35] Where a bond has been given by an heir under a statute authorizing the administrator on written requisition by an heir to disallow a claim on the giving of a bond approved by the court for the payment of all expenses in the collection of such claim, the party giving the bond must be made a party to the suit on a rejected claim and permitted to defend if he desires or he cannot be held liable for the cost and expenses of the suit.[36] Where the petition in an action against an administrator on a note contains no allegation of a partnership between defendant's intestate and other persons named, or of any facts necessarily constituting a partnership as between the intestate and the other persons, it is proper to overrule a plea in abatement that the persons named should have been joined as defendants.[37] The assignor of a senior judgment is a proper party to an action by the holder of a junior judgment against the assignee and the personal representatives of the judgment debtor to enjoin the payment of the senior judgment on the ground that it had been paid before the assignment and to compel the payment of plaintiff's judgment.[38]

[§ 1984] (2) Creditor's Bills. Legatees are ordinarily not necessary parties to a creditor's bill against the estate, because their interests are sufficiently protected by the personal representative;[39] but where the executor is removed, the reason for the rule ceases, and they are necessary parties to such bill in accordance with the general doctrine that all persons having an interest in the object of the suit should be made parties.[40] In a creditor's bill against the administrator and heir of a decedent to enforce the collection of the joint obligation of decedent and another obligor such obligor is a necessary party, although a nonresident in order that he may be made primarily liable for whatever portion of the debt may in equity be due from him.[41] In a creditor's suit to subject the proceeds of money fraudulently donated to defendants by his debtor, the personal representative of the deceased debtor is a proper, but not a necessary, party.[42]

[§ 1985] (3) Suits to Establish Rejected Claims. On rejection of a claim it is to be established, if at all, by an ordinary civil action, brought and prosecuted by the claimant against the administrator the same as against any other defendant,[43] and he can be joined as a defendant with a surety of deceased in a suit by a city on the bond of a deceased municipal contractor.[44] In a suit to establish a rejected claim against a decedent's estate, and to determine the validity of a trust deed given to secure it, the trustee is not a necessary party.[45]

[§ 1986] (4) Proceedings to Subject Property in Hands of Distributees. In a proceeding against distributees to subject property in their hands to the payment of an obligation of the decedent to account for personalty held in trust by him, the executor or administrator must be made a party in order that the validity of the claim against the estate may be determined.[46]

[§ 1987] 5. Actions Relating to Land—a. In General. As a general rule the executor or administrator is not a necessary party to an action by heirs or devisees to recover realty which was part of decedent's estate,[47] nor is he even a proper party,[48] except where he is entitled to possession of the property;[49] and, conversely, the executor is not a necessary party to an action against devisees to recover land claimed by them under the will.[50] Where the executor has been authorized by the probate court to take possession of and rent the land, he is a proper party plaintiff in an action by a devisee to determine the title thereto.[51] In suit by a wife's administrator to set aside deeds, a deed given by herself and husband and a deed given by the grantee to a third person, the proper position of the husband as a party was as a plaintiff, and not as a defendant.[52] rights and powers pass to the personal representative does not empower the personal representative to maintain ejectment with making the mortgagee's heirs at law parties.[54] An administrator, in the absence of statute,[55] cannot maintain a bill in equity to which the heirs are not parties to recover land of his intestate on the ground that the assets of the estate are insufficient to pay its debts,[56] in the absence of a showing that it has been declared insolvent.[57] Where suit is brought by an executor of one succession to recover property seized by the executor of another succession, he must join as defendants the heirs of the seizing creditor.[58] Under a statute providing that in suits against decedent's estates, involving title to land, the executor or administrator, if any, and the heirs, shall be made parties defendant in a suit to recover land, the heirs are necessary parties.[59] Where executors who have, under the will, a naked power of sale seek to cancel their contract for the sale of the land on the ground of want of authority to make the contract, the heirs or devisees are necessary parties.[60]

Representative without heirs or devisees. Where an administrator purchases land at a sale under execution in his favor as such, it may be treated as personalty until his duty in respect to it is performed and he may proceed for its recovery without joining the heirs.[61] Where the purchaser at a sheriff's sale on execution dies, and a conveyance is made to his personal representative, the latter may bring an action to recover possession, without joining any of the heirs.[62] Under a statute providing that ejectment may be maintained in all cases where plaintiff is legally entitled to the possession of the premises, the administrator of an estate, the personal assets of which have been exhausted, leaving debts unpaid, is entitled to bring ejectment for lands of decedent without decedent's heirs being joined,[63] when defendant does not seek affirmative relief against the heirs.[64] Under statutes authorizing an executor to sue without joining the person for whose benefit the action is prosecuted, requiring the executor to take into his possession all the estate of the decedent, and providing that for the purpose of bringing suits to quiet title his possession is the possession of the devisees, and that actions for the recovery of any real property may be maintained by the executor, etc., an action for the cancellation of a deed may be continued on plaintiff's death by his executor without joining the devisees as parties, and their rights are fully protected by an order allowing them to intervene at any time prior to final judgment.[65] If the sole and exclusive right to prosecute and defend all suits concerning decedent's land is given by will to the executor and the legal title vested in him, the devisees are not necessary parties to a suit concerning the land;[66] and where title in fee vests in the executors by the terms of the will, they may maintain an action against one wrongfully in possession of the land for its recovery without joining the heirs as parties.[67]

[§ 1988] b. Foreclosure of Mortgages—(1) After Death of Mortgagee. Where a mortgagee dies, his personal representative is the proper party to maintain a bill to foreclose the mortgage,[68] for the reason that the money secured belongs to the personal estate and draws after it the mortgaged estate as an incident.[69] It has been considered that the heir of the mortgagee is a necessary party,[70] as being a trustee of the legal estate for the executor,[71] and because if the mortgage should be redeemed there would be no one before the court by whom an effectual conveyance of the legal estate could be made.[72] It has also been considered that, where the heir of the mortgagee is in possession, he should be made a party.[73] But the heir is not a necessary party where the statute provides that payment of the mortgage debt to the mortgagee or his representative revests the title in the mortgagor without reconveyance,[74] or that a mortgage may be released by the personal representative of a deceased mortgage,[75] or gives the administrator the sole right to maintain actions for debts due deceased;[76] and under statutes of this character it has been held that the heir is not even a proper party.[77] Where an executor accepts payment of a bond secured by mortgage in Confederate currency and delivers up the bond and enters the mortgage satisfied and cancels it, he is a necessary party to a suit by the legatees against the obligor in the bond to compel him to deliver it up and to obtain control of the property mortgaged for distribution.[78]

On the death of one of two comortgagees, the survivor is the only person who can sue to foreclose, but he must make the representatives of the deceased comortgagee parties.[79]

[§ 1989] (2) After Death of Mortgagor—(a) Personal Representative—aa. As Necessary Party. It is sometimes expressly required by statute that the personal representative of a deceased mortgagor shall be made a party to a suit to foreclose the mortgage,[80] and such joinder has been held to be necessary under statutes giving the personal representative possession of the real as well as the personal property for purposes of administration;[81] but in the absence of any such controlling statute the weight of authority supports the view that the personal representative of the mortgagor is not a necessary party to a foreclosure suit,[82] although there are decisions asserting the contrary view.[83] If the heir desires the benefit of having the personal estate applied in exoneration of the real, he must enforce the right by filing a bill against the representative for such relief.[84] If, however, the bill, in addition to seeking to foreclose, seeks to charge the personal estate with any deficiency in case an amount sufficient to pay the mortgage debt is not realized, the personal representative of the mortgagor is a necessary party;[85] and it has also been held that in the case of a mortgage of a term of years only, the equity belongs to the personal representative and he is a necessary party.[86] If the mortgage comprises both freehold and leasehold estates the heir and the personal representative are both necessary parties.[87]

[§ 1990] bb. As Proper Party. The personal representative of a deceased mortgagor is a proper party to a bill to foreclose the mortgage,[88] and if not made a defendant, he may upon his own motion

"An administrator as such has no interest in the land of his intestate, nor does he represent the general creditors of his intestate in any such sense as makes him a necessary party to a foreclosure action even where there is a deficiency of personalty to pay debts. An administrator is the person through whom any deficiency on the bond and mortgage debt may be collected and he may be made a party defendant and adjudged to pay through his administration of the estate any deficiency which may arise if the plaintiff sees fit to so demand. . . . But it is not incumbent upon the holder of the mortgage to make this demand, for the only necessary parties defendant to a foreclosure action are the persons having title to the premises covered by the mortgage and those who have acquired liens subsequent to the mortgage." [a] Reasons for rule.—(1) The estate is liable for any deficit after exhausting the mortgage, although no judgment can be rendered against the personal representative for the deficiency. Hodgdon v. Heidman, 66 Iowa 645, 24 NW 257; Hill v. Townley, 45 Minn. 167, 47 NW 653. (2) The interest which the personal representative has in being present when an account is taken of the amount remaining due in order that he may see that all proper credits are given and that the sum remaining due it fairly and correctly ascertained is sufficient to make him a proper party. The complainant also has this advantage in making him a party that, while no direct or active relief can be awarded against him, he will nevertheless be concluded by the decree as to the amount due, and if a suit at law or other proceeding should afterward be necessary to recover the whole amount due on the bond, the amount so recovered will be considered, after the proceeds of sale of

be joined as such.[89]

[§ 1991] (b) Heirs. As a general rule the heirs of a deceased mortgagor are necessary parties for a suit to foreclose the mortgage,[90] but it has been held otherwise,[91] and a foreclosure suit against the personal representative without joining the heirs is sometimes authorized by statute.[92]

[§ 1992] c. Redemption from Mortgage. The personal representative of a mortgagor is sometimes given by statute the right to sue to redeem mortgage premises,[93] and the same right has been held to arise from a statute giving the representative the right to possession of decedent's land.[94] But in the absence of statute a suit for redemption is properly brought by the heirs or devisees,[95] and it is not necessary to make the personal representative a party where all payments on the debt were made by the heir and no effort is made to charge the personal assets of the estate.[96] Where, however, the bill alleges that part of the mortgage was paid by the mortgagor in his lifetime, his personal representative as well as his heir or devisee is a necessary party to take an account of what is due on the mortgage;[97] and it has been said that as the personal assets are usually first to be applied in exoneration of the real estate mortgaged it would seem that on a bill to redeem by the heir or devisee the personal representative of the mortgagor might properly be made a party defendant in order to have the assets so applied.[98] Where a bill by heirs of a deceased grantor to declare his deed a mortgage alleges that his estate owed no debts and that there was no necessity for an administration, the personal representative is not a necessary party and the bill is properly filed by the heirs alone.[99] In case of the death of a mortgagee, his personal representative, being entitled to receive payment of the mortgage debt, is a necessary party to an action to a suit by the mortgagor to redeem,[1] and, under the modern view that a mortgage is merely security for a debt,[2] the heirs of the mortgagee are not necessary parties.[3]

[§ 1993] d. Enforcement of Vendor's Lien. The personal representative of a deceased vendor is the proper party to file a bill to enforce a lien for unpaid purchase money.[4] If the legal title has been retained by the vendor[5] his heirs or devisees are necessary parties,[6] and it has been held that their presence cannot be dispensed with by tendering either in the pleadings or at the trial a deed from the heirs to the purchasers unless the latter accepts the deed.[7] One who has purchased at an administrator's sale part of the land previously sold by decedent, and on which the administrator is seeking to foreclose a vendor's lien, has such an interest as warrants the court to permit him to become a party defendant.[8] Where the purchaser of land dies, his heirs or devisees are ordinarily necessary parties defendant to a bill to enforce a vendor's lien on the land;[9] but the personal representative is also a proper,[10] and ordinarily a necessary,[11] party, because the personal estate is primarily liable for the mortgaged premises have been credited, as having been unalterably determined by the decree in the foreclosure suit. United Security L. Ins., etc., Co. v. Vandegrift, 51 N. J. Eq. 400, 26 A 985.

[a] When the administrator delivers possession of the property of the succession to the widow and heirs with the consent of a particular creditor, and such creditor after eight years seeks to foreclose a mortgage given by decedent on the property so delivered, the heirs and the widow are necessary parties to the proceedings, and notice to the former administrator alone is not sufficient. Barton v. Burbank, 114 La. 224, 38 S 150.

[b] Circumstances under which widow and heirs permitted to join.— An administrator filed a petition against the widow and heirs seeking to sell certain land to pay off a mortgage given by decedent to secure a note. The widow and heirs answered that the note had been fully paid by the deceased in his lifetime. The mortgagee was made a party plaintiff to the proceeding. The administrator and mortgagee submitted to a voluntary nonsuit. Thereafter the widow and heirs sued the mortgagee, alleging that the mortgage indebtedness had been fully paid by the deceased in his lifetime, and praying that the note and mortgage are canceled, and the cloud upon their title be thus removed. The mortgagee denied payment, and a trial was had, resulting in the judgment that the note and mortgage are surrendered by defendant and canceled. Subsequently the mortgagee sued the administrator to foreclose the mortgage, and the administrator refused to answer. It was held in such subsequent suit, that the court properly permitted the widow and heirs to become defendants and answer the complaint, by setting up the judgment canceling the note and mortgage, it being manifestly just, under the circumstances, that they are given the opportunity to resist the foreclosure of the mortgage and prevent the land from being applied to the payment of a debt which does not exist. [a] Personal representative of the debt and the heir or devisee is entitled to have the personal estate first applied to the payment thereof.[12] But it has been held that, where a debt has long been barred so that a deficiency judgment cannot be had, the personal representatives of a deceased purchaser need not be made parties to a proceeding against his heirs to enforce a vendor's lien.[13]

[§ 1994] e. Release of Vendor's Lien. Where a vendor's lien has been reserved by a person who has since died, his personal representative is a necessary party to a bill seeking the release of the lien.[14]

[§ 1995] f. Enforcement of Mechanic's Lien. In a proceeding to enforce a mechanic's lien against decedent's land, his administrator is properly cited to defend, where the land is needed to pay debts.[15]

[§ 1996] g. Specific Performance of Contract of Sale—(1) After Death of Vendor. As a general rule the heirs or devisees of the deceased vendor in an executory contract of sale are necessary parties to a suit by his personal representative against the purchaser to enforce specific performance,[16] although it has been held otherwise under a statute giving the personal representative of a deceased vendor power to convey the property.[17] Where an action for specific performance is brought by the purchaser, the heirs or devisees of the vendor are necessary parties,[18] unless the statute authorizes the bringing of such an action against the personal representative alone;[19] but the representative is also a proper party, as the representative of creditors, to pay whom the property may be needed,[20] although he is not a necessary party.[21] One who claims property as a remainderman under a marriage agreement between his parents and brings a bill for specific performance of such agreement should not make the legatees in his father's will parties defendant,[22] as the executor represents the adverse interest under the will.[23]

[§ 1997] (2) After Death of Purchaser. The representative of the purchaser may properly join as a complainant in a bill for specific performance when the purchase money is unpaid or the fact of payment is controverted,[24] but it is otherwise where the purchase money has been paid in full,[25] and the bill affirmatively shows that there can be no necessity for the exercise by the administrator of his statutory powers over the real estate.[26] The widow of the purchaser is a necessary party complainant because she was entitled to dower in her husband's equitable estate in the land at the time of his subpurchaser.—Where a purchaser of land resells it and the person purchasing from him dies, the personal representative of the latter is a necessary party to a bill to enforce a vendor's lien on the land. Mullins v. Sparks, 43 Miss. 129.

[b] Administrator ad litem.—When the bill alleges that the estate is largely insolvent and has been declared insolvent and that all the assets have been administered and distributed, the estate should be represented by an administrator with full powers, and an administrator ad litem is not sufficient. Moore v. Alexander, 81 Ala. 509, 8 S 199.

[c] Limitations of rule.—(1) The personal representative of the deceased purchaser is not a necessary party defendant if decedent left no personal estate to be administered and this is alleged in the bill. Overly v. Tipton, 68 Ind. 410. (2) Where the purchaser was a nonresident and died without personal estate or a personal representative in the state, a bill might be brought against the heirs alone. Reed v. Gregory, 46 Miss. 740. (3) When complainant sues as assignee of a promissory note given for the purchase money of land claiming as residuary legatee under the will of the deceased vendor, and it is shown that the executors have made a final settlement of the estate and delivered the note to complainant, they are neither necessary nor proper parties to the suit. [a] Reason for rule.—"Boreing did not accept the deed to the out lands which was tendered to him by Brackett. The legal title to these lands therefore remained in Brackett, and when he died descended to his heirs at law. They look the legal title subject to his heirs at law. They took the legal title subject to the right of Boreing to accept the deed which their father tendered, or subject to the power of the chancellor to compel the aceptance of the deed by Boreing. But they are necessary parties to the action, for no valid title will be made to Boreing for the land unless they are before the court and bound by the orders of the court." Brackett v. Boreing, 89 SW 496, 500, 28 KyL 386.

[b] Effect of conveyance by heirs to personal representative.—Where the heirs consent to have a contract of sale executed and voluntarily convey the title to the administratrix to enable her to transfer it to the purchaser, it is not necessary to make them parties in a suit for specific performance of the contract brought by the administratrix. 18. Duncan v. Wickliffe, 5 Ill. 452; Carr v. Callaghan, 3 Litt. (Ky.) 365.

[a] Reason of rule.—This is necessary in order to afford the heirs an opportunity of contesting the fact whether their ancestor had done an act by which their interest in the property alleged to be conveyed should be divested. Carr v. Callaghan, 3 Litt. (Ky.) 365.

[a] Where representative not a party and no title shown.—Where the administrator of a decedent, who contracted to convey land, is not made a party to a bill for specific performance, and complainant admits that decedent had no title, it is error to decree specific performance. [b] Contract to devise homestead.—The executor of the obligor is not a necessary party to a suit for specific performance of a contract to devise a homestead where he is not charged with any duty involving the land in question. Eastman v. Eastman, 117 Me. 276, 104 A 1.

24. McKay v. Broad, 70 Ala. 377.

[a] Necessary party.—Where the purchaser dies, and his heirs seek to enforce specific performance against the vendor, the representative of the purchaser is a necessary party defendant, as the heirs to whom the contract descends in equity are entitled to have the contract primarily paid out of the personal assets. Champion v. Brown, 6 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 398, 10 AmD 343; Story Eq. Pl. § 177. See also Downing v. Risley, 15 N. J. Eq. 93 (where the estate has not been settled or decedent's debts paid, the administrator should be a party because he has an interest in disputing the contract, and is the party liable to pay the purchase money).

[a] Amendment striking out name of administrator.—When a bill is improperly filed in the name of an administrator as sole plaintiff, and the heirs are brought in by amendment, the name of the administrator cannot be struck out by a second amendment, since this would work an entire change of parties. McKay v. Broad, 70 Ala. 377.

death.[27] The heirs or devisees, as well as the personal representative, of the purchaser are necessary parties to a suit by the vendor for specific performance.[28]

[§ 1998] h. Rescission of Decedent's Contract. The personal representative of a vendor against whom a rescission of contract for the sale of land is asked is a necessary party to the suit,[29] and if he is empowered to sell lands and make and acknowledge titles, he represents all the beneficiaries and they are not necessary parties.[30] So where an obligee of a bond for the conveyance of land dies before the time fixed for the conveyance, his executors must be made parties to a bill to rescind the contract on the ground of fraud on the part of the obligor.[31] If a covenant to convey is not broken in the purchaser's lifetime, his heirs, being entitled to all the advantages resulting from the covenant, are necessary parties to an action to cancel the contract.[32] An administrator's bill to cancel decedent's deed, being for the benefit of all persons interested in the estate, a decree setting it aside cannot be disturbed, on appeal of defendants, as affecting the interest of a person not a party.[33]

[§ 1999] i. Recovery of Purchase Price of Property Sold.[34] The personal representative of a deceased vendor of land should be a party to a suit for the recovery of the purchase money;[35] but the heirs are not necessary parties,[36] nor is it proper to join the widow, or, after her death, her next of kin.[37] When an executor acting in good faith and in the exercise of sound discretion has purchased lands at a judicial sale in order to save a debt due to the estate, the lands are regarded simply as personalty in his hands, and the devisees or heirs are not necessary parties to a bill filed by him against a subsequent purchaser to subject the lands to payment of the purchase money.[38]

[§ 2000] j. Suits to Set Aside Fraudulent Conveyances of Decedent. The question whether or not a personal representative is a proper party to bring suit to set aside a fraudulent conveyance executed by his decedent has already been discussed in this treatise.[39] The necessity or propriety of joining the personal representative of the grantor in an action by creditors to set aside such a conveyance is discussed in another article.[40]

[§ 2001] k. Suits to Set Aside Conveyances for Fraud. Where an executor and testamentary trustee sues to set aside a conveyance made by him as induced by fraud, he may also join himself as plaintiff in his individual capacity.[41]

[§ 2002] l. Suits to Quiet Title. The heirs or devisees are the proper parties to sue to quiet title to land of which decedent died possessed,[42] unless a different rule is established by statute.[43] A statute requiring the heirs or devisees to be made parties defendant to every action against the estate involving the title to real estate applies to a suit to quiet title.[44]

[§ 2003] m. Suits to Subject Land to Payment of Debts. The administrator is a proper party to an action to subject lands conveyed by a decedent to the lien of a creditor,[45] although not a necessary party to a suit to subject the lands to a judgment lien, decedent admittedly having died without personal assets, and no relief against the administrator being sought.[46] An estate by the entireties devolves on the wife's death on the husband, so that her personal representatives are not necessary parties to a proceeding to collect a judgment against the husband and wife from property so held.[47] Questions relating to the proper parties where the lands sought to be subjected are in the possession of heirs or devisees are considered elsewhere in this work.[48]

[§ 2004] n. Vacation of Condemnation Proceedings. An administrator has been held to be a necessary party to a proceeding to vacate condemnation proceedings.[49]

[§ 2005] o. Establishment of Right of Way. In an action to establish a right of way across the land of a decedent, the heirs or devisees are necessary parties defendant.[50]

[§ 2006] p. Enforcement of Trust. The heirs are necessary parties defendant in a suit against an administrator to obtain a conveyance of real estate alleged to have been held in trust for complainant by defendant's intestate.[51]

[§ 2007] q. Reformation of Instrument. The heir of a deceased mortgagee is not a necessary party to a proceeding to correct a misdescription in the mortgage.[52] A suit to correct a mistake in a sale of a land certificate by an executor is not a suit to contest the title of the estate to land, within a statute requiring the executor and heirs and devisees to be made parties to suits contesting the estate's title to land.[53] Where an executrix, on the sale of her testator's real estate, took a purchase-money mortgage in her own name, a suit for the reformation of the mortgage, so as to make the mortgage payable to her as executrix, cannot be maintained without making the purchaser and the representative of the deceased executrix parties.[54]

[§ 2008] r. Enjoining Sale by Representative. All the devisees must be made parties to a bill to enjoin executors from selling land belonging to testator's estate.[55]

[§ 2009] s. Action for Cutting and Carrying Away Timber. Where plaintiff's intestate owned an undivided half of the timber on certain land which had been cut and converted by defendants, the intestate's cotenants were not necessary parties to an action by his administrator against the parties who cut and converted the timber for such conversion.[56]

[§ 2010] t. Actions on Covenants. It is improper to join the heir and residuary legatee with the administrator of a grantor in an action on the grantor's covenant.[57]

[§ 2011] u. Action to Restrain Paving Contract by City. Until the heirs have come forward and accepted the succession and taken charge of it they cannot undertake to represent it and have not alone the quality to stand in judgment in a suit as an abutting owner and taxpayer to restrain the city from entering into a paving contract, but the testamentary executor is the proper person to represent the succession.[58]

[§ 2012] 6. Suit for Specific Performance of Contract of Adoption. Where a decedent made a contract to adopt a child and to give it a child's rights in his estate, but died without formally adopting the child, and an action was brought to enforce specific performance of the contract so far as the property was concerned, the administrator was properly made a party in order that he might be restrained from delivering the property to the next of kin,[59] although he would not have been a proper party if no affirmative relief had been sought against him.[60]

[§ 2013] 7. Actions or Suits for Legacies or Distributive Shares—a. Actions at Law. Where the interests of legatees or distributees have been ascertained and fixed by decree and the share of each determined, each may maintain a separate suit for his share without joining the others;[61] and the same is true where the whole estate has been converted into money as directed by a nonintervention will, and the determination of the amount to which each legatee is entitled is a mere matter of calculation.[62] The assignee of a residuary legatee is entitled to maintain an action against the executors and one to whom a part of the estate has been conveyed in payment of an individual indebtedness of one of the executors.[63] Judgment cannot be rendered against executors, on proceedings instituted in the name of the husband alone, for his wife's distributive share in an estate.[64]

[§ 2014] b. Suits in Equity—(1) By General or Specific Legatee. Where a legatee brings suit to recover a legacy, the executor is a necessary party defendant,[65] but it is not necessary that other legatees or the residuary legatee are made parties,[66] especially where sufficient assets are admitted by the executor.[67] So far as the residuary legatees are concerned, the executor is their legal representative and it is his duty to see that they are properly defended.[68] Where, however, the suit involves the construction and effect of the residuary clause in the will, the residuary legatees are necessary parties;[69] and to a bill brought by a legatee where legacy is charged on real estate, all other legatees whose legacies are charged on real estate are necessary parties,[70] and the devisee of the land is also a

[b] Limitation of rule.—Where, by misrepresentation of the residuary legatee, the legatee receives only a party of his legacy, and the executor has paid over all the remaining assets to the residuary legatee, the legatee may bring a bill against the residuary legatee and the representative of the executor for what remains due him without making the representative of the testator a party. necessary party.[71] Where several general legatees bring separate suits against the executors to recover the amount of their legacies and the estate is insufficient to pay them all, the court will direct an account of the estate to be taken in one cause only and in the meantime direct the proceedings in all the other suits to be stayed.[72] A stranger to whom it is alleged that the legacy has been paid for the benefit of the legatees is not a necessary party defendant in a suit against the executor for the recovery of the legacy;[73] and it has been held that an administrator de bonis non with the will annexed is not a necessary party to a bill for a legacy filed by a legatee against the personal representative of the deceased executor of the testator, the executor having received assets to pay the legacy.[74] Debtors to the estate should not be joined,[75] unless special cause for such joinder is made to appear[76] as where there is collusion between the executor and the debtor or where the executor is insolvent.[77] One who is indebted to the executor is not a proper party to a suit against the executor for a legacy.[78] In a suit by a legatee to recover part of property conveyed to a widow under a decree based on her interest in the estate of her deceased husband, the personal representative of widow's estate is a necessary party.[79]

[§ 2015] (2) By Residuary Legatee or Distributee. The executor or administrator is a necessary party to a bill by a residuary legatee or a distributee seeking to recover his share of the estate.[80] Where there has been collusion between the personal representative and a debtor of the estate to avoid payment of the debt, the debtor may be joined as a party.[81] The administrator is not a necessary party to a suit by the heirs to enjoin a bank from paying funds belonging to decedent to an adverse claimant thereof.[82]

"The general rule of this Court is that all persons interested in the subject of a suit must be parties, except where their numbers are so great as to render the application of the rule highly inconvenient or impracticable. And therefore, where the interests of a class, as of the children or next of kin of a particular person, is concerned, the whole of those who constitute the class must be parties, and the Court must be satisfied, by evidence of some kind, that they are so." Hawkins v. Hawkins, supra.

[b] Distributees not named as complainants.—In a suit by a part of the distributees against the administrator, the court has power, after determining the fund due from the administrator, to decree the separate sums due from such fund to the several distributees of the estate, although many of such distributees are not named as complainants in the bill. Thornton v. Tison, 95 Ala. 589, 10 S 639.

[b] Executor appointed in another state.—Where a residuary legatee sues the executor and other residuary dispensed with where it would be impracticable or very inconvenient to enforce the rule requiring such joinder,[85] and the court can do substantial justice to the parties before it without injury to absent parties equally interested.[86] So where the persons interested are very numerous and some of them are out of the jurisdiction, the court on being satisfied that it has before it a sufficient number to ensure a fair trial of the question at issue, may hear the cause and distribute the shares of the parties before it.[87] The decree in such case should, however, be without prejudice to the rights of those who are not made parties and who do not come in before the decree,[88] and it is not conclusive upon persons not made parties.[89] So one of several distributees may sue for his distributive share without making the other distributees parties, if the latter are unknown and cannot be found and this fact is stated in the bill.[90] It has also been said that the necessity for the relaxation of the rule is more especially apparent in the courts of the United States, where oftentimes the enforcement of the rule would oust them of their jurisdiction and deprive parties entitled to the interposition of a court of equity of any remedy whatever.[91] A distributee who has sold out his interest need not be made a party of the bill for distribution.[92]

Creditors, specific legatees, and prior encumbrancers. It has been held that creditors, specific legatees, or prior encumbrancers need not be made parties to a bill of the character under consideration,[93] although some of the legacies to be paid before the residuum are not to be paid immediately and may depend on such residuum to make up any deficiency;[94] but it has also been considered that specific legatees should be made parties unless it satisfactorily appears that their legacies have been satisfied, in which case it is not necessary to join them.[95] If the administrator has wrongfully paid over money belonging to a distributee to a third person the latter may be properly joined as a defendant in a suit against the administrator for its recovery.[96] Where a specific legatee was dead at the time of the execution of the will and the next of kin sues the executor to recover the amount of the legacy as undisposed of property, the trustee of the residuary legatee is not a necessary party, although the sum sued for may have been paid to him by the executor.[97] Where a testator devised his residuary estate to his daughter subject to a legacy contingent on her weath without issue and the amount of such legacy was held by the testator's executor and passed to his executors on his death, such executors are properly joined as defendants with the administrator of the daughter after her death without issue in an action to recover the legacy.[98]

[§ 2016] (3) By Representative of Legatee or Distributee. A bill for a legacy or distributive share belonging to one deceased cannot be maintained by the next of kin but must be brought by his personal representative.[99]

[§ 2017] (4) By Purchaser from or Assignee of Legatee or Distributee. One who purchases a distributee's interest may maintain a bill in his own name to compel distribution where the vendor and the other distributees are before the court;[1] and it has been held that a legatee who has assigned all his interest is neither a necessary nor a proper party to a bill by his assignee for the recovery of the legacy.[2] Where a widow assigned notes and claims of her husband, to which she was entitled, to a married woman, and on the death of the latter her husband and children reconveyed the notes and claims to the widow, who then brought suit against the administrator of her deceased husband to compel a settlement of the estate, the widow was not entitled to have a distribution of the assets in the administrator's hands without bringing into court as a party the personal representative of the deceased assignee of the notes and claims.[3]

[§ 2018] (5) By Attaching Creditor of Legatee. In a suit by one who has succeeded by operation of law by virtue of attachment proceedings to the rights of a legatee against the executor of the estate to compel payment to him of the legacy, the legatee is a necessary party and the bill will be demurrable for failure to join him as such.[4]

[§ 2019] (6) By Person Claiming as Devisee or Legatee and Next of Kin of Decedent. Where there has been no accounting between the executors of a testator and the executors of a legatee under his will, nor between the executors of the legatee and one claiming an interest in the legacy and original estate as next of kin and also as devisee of the legatee, the amount due such claimant cannot be delegatees for a distribution of the estate, the executor of a deceased nonresident legatee may be made a defendant, although appointed as executor in another state. Stone v. Demarest, 67 App. Div. 549, 73 NYS 903.

termined in an action to which the only parties are the claimant and the executors of the original testator.[5]

[§ 2020] 8. Action by Widow to Enforce Statutory Rights in Estate. In a widow's action against the executrix of her deceased husband, the widow claiming to be entitled to certain personal property by operation of law and not under the will, the legatees who are interested only in so much of the estate as passed by the will and who are represented by the executrix are not necessary parties.[6]

[§ 2021] 9. Suits for Marshaling Assets. Where a suit is instituted for marshaling assets, the executor or administrator must be made a party,[7] and it has been considered that legatees[8] and heirs or distributees[9] are also necessary parties to such a suit. Where an executor sues to marshal assets and enjoin pending actions of creditors who are not expressly named as parties defendant, an interlocutory injunction will not be reversed for want of jurisdiction, where on the hearing one of the creditors is made a party.[10]

[§ 2022] 10. Actions for Settlement of Partnership Affairs. The beneficiaries under a decedent's will are not necessary parties to an action by the executor against decedent's surviving partner for an accounting of the good will of the firm business.[11]

[§ 2023] 11. Proceedings for Revival of Judgment. The personal representative of a judgment debtor is not a necessary party to proceedings to revive a judgment which is merely for the sale of land and does not grant any personal relief.[12]

[§ 2024] 12. Actions for Insurance Premiums Paid by Decedent in Fraud of Creditors. Where insured's estate is insolvent, his administrator is the proper party to sue to recover premiums paid by insured in fraud of creditors, out of the proceeds of the policies.[13]

[§ 2025] 13. Suits to Enforce Contribution for Overpayment on Distribution. Distributees of an estate who have voluntarily contribtued the respective sums with which they are chargeable by reason of overadvances made by the administrator in a partial distribution of the estate are not necessary parties to a bill filed by him to recover contribution from another distributee who refuses to reimburse him.[14]

[§ 2026] 14. Actions on Joint Rights of Action in Favor of Decedent and Others. Where one of two or more persons having a joint right of action dies, the right of action vests in the survivor or survivors.[15] In consequence, the action must be brought in the name of the survivor or survivors alone, and it is error to join as plaintiff the personal representative of decedent.[16] Nor can the personal representative sue separately, for the entire legal interest survives; he must resort to a court of equity to obtain from the survivor decedent's share of the amount recovered.[17]

[§ 2027] 15. Actions or Suits on Joint or Joint and Several Obligations of Decedent and Others. If a contract is joint and several, the personal representative of one obligor may be sued at law in a separate action,[18] and it is sometimes permitted by statute that the personal representative of a joint obligor may be sued alone on the obligation and judgment entered against him.[19] Where the practice remains unaffected by statute, if a contract is joint or joint and several, the personal representative of a deceased obligor cannot be joined with the survivor as a defendant in an action at law on the contract.[20] The reason given, as respects both classes of contracts, is that the same judgment cannot be rendered against the survivor and personal representative because one is to be charged be bonis testatoris and the other de bonis propriis,[21] and as respects contracts which are joint only, and not joint and several, a still stronger reason is that the death of one joint obligor extinguishes all remedy at law against his estate and casts the legal liability under the contract on the surviving obligor.[22] However, it has been held that a bill in chancery on a joint obligation must join as a defendant the personal representative of a deceased obligor.[23] In some jurisdictions it has been held that the common-law rule is not affected by the adoption of the code system of pleading.[24] But in others the rule is considered to have been abolished by the codes, through necessary implication, and it is held that in actions on joint or joint and several obligations the personal representative of a deceased obligor may be joined as defendants with the surviving obligors.[25] There are sometimes found express statutory provisions or rules of court authorizing the joinder of a surviving obligor and the personal representatives of the deceased obligor,[26] or the substitution, as a codefendant, of the personal representatives of an obligor who died after the suit was instituted.[27]

[§ 2028] 16. Actions Based on Wrongful Acts of Personal Representative. Where an executor has been guilty of fraudulent conduct in dealing with the assets of the estate, his coexecutors may bring suit against him for an accounting without joining creditors, next of kin, or legatees.[29] Creditors, legatees, and distributees may maintain an action against the personal representative of an administrator or executor for waste or conversion of the assets of the estate,[30] and it is not necessary to join the administrator de bonis non of the original action survives against the surviving obligor and his representative. Head v. Oliver, 1 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 254.

decedent,[31] as the latter cannot sue the representative of a former executor or administrator either at common law or in equity for assets wasted and converted by the first executor or administrator.[32] When a suit is instituted or a bill filed to recover property sold illegally by the administrator out of the hands of those who had purchased or possess it, the sureties on his bond are neither proper nor necessary parties.[33] Where an administrator commits a fraud upon the estate, or colludes with others to do so, the heirs may bring an equitable action against such administrator and the person charged to be in collusion with him for the purpose of protecting the estate.[34] Where the wrongful acts complained of consist of the sale of personal property of the estate, all purchasers and the personal representative sought to be made liable should be united in the same suit.[35] If heirs bring a suit against the administrator charging a fraudulent conversion of the assets all the heirs are necessary parties.[36] Where, in an action by a judgment creditor of an administrator in the nature of a creditor's bill, plaintiff seeks to subject to the payment of his judgment land the legal title to which was in a third person at the time of intestate's death and which the administrator fraudulently caused to be conveyed to defendant, such third person and the administrator are necessary parties.[37]

[§ 2030] 18. Suits for General Administration of Estate. Where suit is brought for a general administration of an estate, a properly constituted personal representative of the estate is always a necessary party;[38] consequently if a personal representative is out of the jurisdiction the suit cannot proceed,[39] and the court will not decree a general account and administration in a suit in which decedent is represented by an administrator ad litem merely.[40] Where a bill is brought for an administration of the estate, and the executor dies, the suit cannot be revived against his personal representative, but there must be a representative of the testator before the court,[41] and where children of a deceased administrator of an estate, in which they have no interest, bring an action against the administrator de bonis non for a settlement, the original administrator's estate should be administered, and his administrator made a party to the action.[42] Where an administrator with the will annexed, who is also testamentary trustee, sues for an accounting and confirmation of various settlements, and releases, and one of the legatees is dead, a legatee of the deceased legatee is not a necessary party;[43] but where the deceased legatee resided in another state, and his will was there proved, the legatee under it may be properly joined as a party, he having an interest in the controversy adverse to plaintiff.[44] Where a surviving husband agreed with the heirs of the wife, in the event of the will of the wife being set aside, to accept a certain sum of money in full, and from it to pay specified sums to certain persons, none of whom, after the will was annulled, had any interest in the estate or were parties in fact to the settlement, it was not necessary that they should be parties to a bill filed by the heirs, which related to the final disposition of the estate in the hands of the administrator de bonis non of the wife.[45] A distributee may join in one suit the administrator and a debtor of the estate, where both are necessary parties for a settlement of the estate, and the administrator and debtor were on intimate terms with decedent, who intrusted them with the management of her business, and each of them was indebted to the estate, and the administrator had not charged his own indebtedness nor attempted to collect that of the debtor.[46]

[§ 2031] 19. Suit to Remove Administration into Chancery Court. Sureties on an administrator's bond are not proper parties to a bill against the administrator to remove the administration of the estate from the probate into the chancery court.[47]

[§ 2032] 20. Joinder of Coexecutors or Coadministrators—a. Actions at Law—(1) By Executors—(a) Common-Law Rule. The common-law doctrine is that in actions at law all the executors named in the will, who are living, must join, although some have refused or omitted to prove the will or to administer the estate[48] and even though one or more of the executors are infants.[49] If the renouncing executor will not join in the suit, the practice is to issue the writ in his name and then

[a] Reason for rule.—The reasons assigned for the rule at law are that the executors constitute but one person; that each executor derives his interest from the will itself; that the probate is merely operative as the authenticated evidence, and not as the foundation of the executor's title; and that the renunciation is a renunciation of probate merely and not a renunciation or waiver of title. [b] Waiver of objection.—Where the action is brought by one executor alone the others are made defendants, and no question is raised on account of the misjoinder before judgment is rendered, the failure to name them as plaintiffs is not a fatal objection. to summon or rule him to proceed, and if he will not, the court will give judgment of severance.[50] The rule does not apply to actions which an executor can maintain in his individual capacity; it has accordingly been held that an executor may, without joining him with his corepresentatives, maintain an action to recover a loan,[51] or to recover money had and received to his use,[52] or on a sealed note given to himself,[53] and that no more should be joined than those who made the contract sought to be enforced.[54] Where a will appointing several executors makes provision for one acting alone and only one proves the will, he alone can maintain an action in behalf of the estate.[55]

[§ 2033] (b) Rule under Statute. The common-law rule discussed above[56] has been very generally superseded by statutes under which the executors who have qualified may maintain an action without joining other persons nominated in the will as executors but who have not qualified.[57] It is usually necessary that all the executors who have qualified shall join.[58]

[§ 2034] (c) Objection for Nonjoinder. Where all the executors are not joined, the defect may be availed of by plea in abatement setting up that there are other executors living not named,[59] and it has been held that the defect can only be taken advantage of in this manner, unless the practice is changed by statute.[60] Under code practice the objection is properly taken by demurrer, if the defect appears on the face of the complaint,[61] and otherwise by answer.[62] At common law, on a plea in abatement, it is sufficient to allege that the person who was not joined was constituted executor and is still living, and it is unnecessary to allege that he has administered upon the estate,[63] but where the statute permits those executors who have qualified to sue without joining others, it is necessary to allege that the executor not joined was qualified.[64]

[§ 2035] (d) Joining Coexecutors as Defendants. Where an executor refuses to join or cannot properly join in a complaint by a coexecutor for the benefit of the estate, the refusing executor may be made a party defendant,[65] and it has been held that in an action by an executor to recover money lent by testator, the coexecutors were properly made defendants, without a request that they join as plaintiffs, where they were subservient to the principal defendant and hostile to plaintiff executor.[66]

[§ 2036] (2) By Administrators—(a) General Rule. Where there are several administrators their power is joint only and the general rule is that they must sue jointly.[67] Nevertheless an administrator may, without joining his coadministrators, maintain an action for the price of property belonging to the estate sold by him;[68] and where an administrator makes an unauthorized loan an action to recover it back should be brought in his name alone.[69] On a note payable to intestate or bearer, an administrator need not sue in his representative character or join his coadministrator as plaintiff;[70] and where subsequent to a decree in favor of several administrators some of them are removed action may be brought on the decree in the name of the remaining administrator.[71] An administrator suing to recover damages for breach of covenant, broken after intestate's death, cannot unite with him one who was a joint administrator with him in another state, since the authority of a foreign administrator to sue is not recognized.[72]

[§ 2037] (b) Where One Refuses to Prosecute. The practice at law is to bring the suit in the first place in the name of all the administrators, and if either of them is unwilling to have the suit prosecuted in his name afterward, the one who has instituted the suit may then upon a summons have a judgment of severance and continue the suit in his own name only.[73] But under a statute providing that if the consent of one who should be joined as plaintiff cannot be obtained, he may be made a defendant, on the reason therefor being stated in the petition, if one of two administrators refuses to join in an action on a cause of action belonging to the estate the other may bring the action, joining the refusing administrator as defendant and stating in the petition the reason therefor.[74]

[§ 2038] (3) Against Executors or Administrators. All the executors who have qualified[75] or all the administrators[76] must be made parties defendant to an action by which it is sought to charge the estate of a decedent. At common law all persons named as executors in the will may be joined as parties defendant, although they have not proved the will,[77] but it is necessary to join as defendants only those who have administered,[78] for a stranger is bound to take notice of those only as executors who have acted as such.[79] Where a coexecutor has administered he should be joined as defendant, although he refused to prove the will.[80] It has been held, however, that nonresidence of a coexecutor is sufficient to relieve plaintiff from the necessity of joining him in an action against his coexecutor,[81] and that if one of two executors has in his hands the balance remaining for distribution an action may be maintained against him without joining his coexecutor.[82] The objection for nonjoinder may be taken advantage of by a motion for nonsuit.[83]

[§ 2039] b. Suits in Equity—(1) By Executors or Administrators. In equity all the executors who prove the will must be joined as complainants, but those who have not proved the will need not be joined.[84] If, however, an executor or administrator who should join as a coplaintiff refuses to join in the suit, he should be joined as a defendant and the suit cannot be carried on in his name as plaintiff without his consent.[85] If one executor renounces, the others may file a bill in their name and may make him a party defendant if necessary to bring him before the court, stating in the bill the fact of his refusal to join as complainant.[86] Where a suit is brought by one of two coexecutors against the other for a debt due from the latter to the estate, the latter should not be made a complainant, but should be made a defendant in the character in which he owes the debt.[87] Where nothing is involved but the appropriation of money a single executor may ask aid of the court for that purpose,[88] especially where the other executor is personally interested in the fund and is brought into court so that he can answer and protect the fund in which he is interested in its entirety.[89]

[§ 2040] (2) Against Executors or Administrators. Where there are several executors or administrators it is not ordinarily permissible to sue any number less than all,[90] unless perhaps, where from special reasons shown, the character of the relief sought makes it unnecessary to join them.[91]

Waiver of objection for nonjoinder. Where one of two executors also made trustees in their individual capacity fails to qualify, the failure to join him as defendant in a suit to foreclose a mortgage given by testator does not invalidate a sale in such proceedings where neither the heirs, legatees, cestuis que trust, nor the widow as individually vested with the remainder or as sole executrix, and trustee, made any objection to the foreclosure proceedings to which they were necessary parties.[92]

[§ 2041] 21. Joinder of Representatives of Different Estates. Where a person is administrator of the estates of husband and wife and it is doubtful whether the right to a fund is in the estate of husband or wife, he may sue for it in equity in both characters.[93] A count for money had and received or for money paid to the use of one person as administrator of a certain decedent and to another person as administrator of another decedent is bad, and judgment cannot be rendered thereon against defendants either jointly or severally.[94]

[§ 2042] 22. Personal Representative as Party in Both Individual and Representative Capacity. A personal representative who is also beneficially interested in the estate may sue both in his representative and in his individual capacity, such action involving no misjoinder,[95] and in a proper case an action may be brought against a personal representative in both his individual and his representative capacity.[96]

[§ 2043] 23. Personal Representative as Plaintiff and Defendant in Same Action. The courts do not permit a party to be both plaintiff and defendant in the same action and therefore it is not competent for a personal representative acting in his representative capacity to sue himself in his individual capacity.[97] The rule is not altered by the fact that his corepresentative is joined with him as coplaintiff, but the pleading may be amended by striking out his name as coplaintiff.[98] On the other hand a personal representative cannot maintain a suit in his individual capacity against himself in his representative capacity.[99] Neither can an individual, as representative of one estate, maintain an action against himself as representative of another estate.[1] It has been held, however, that the court will take jurisdiction of an action on a claim against a decedent's estate, although the guardian of the insane claimant and the administrator of decedent are the same person, where the action is brought and defended in good faith.[2]

[§ 2044] 24. Intervention. The personal representative may insist on being made a party to a bill against the heir for the discovery of assets and their application to the payment of debts,[3] and one who is an acknowledged representative of a decedent should be allowed on application to intervene in a special proceeding in the surrogate's court to which decedent was a party.[4] Where one of several makers of a note dies, his representative may appear as a party defendant to contest the validity of the note.[5] In a vendor's suit against the purchaser's assignee, praying for a sale of the land by a receiver and the application of the proceeds to the price, the purchaser's administrator may be made a party on his application.[6] In a suit by a client against her attorneys to set aside an assignment of her interest in the estate of her father on a contest of the will, the executors, being accountable to any one entitled to receive decedent's property, were entitled to intervene.[7] Where a mortgage and the debt secured thereby pass from the intestate as a gift causa mortis, the administrator can intervene in the suit on the mortgage only at the request of the donees and for their benefit;[8] and where one heir sues the others on an alleged contract with the ancestor whereby after administration plaintiff would be entitled to a distribution of all the property remaining in the hands of the administrator, the latter has no interest in the controversy and violates no obligation of his trust by not intervening.[9] Where a suit is brought for partition between heirs of decedent, the administrator cannot intervene asking for a sale of the land to make assets nor interfere in the proceeding in any manner.[10] Where a personal representative asking permission to intervene alleges his representative capacity, it is not proper to admit him as a party without first compelling him to prove his legal appointment, although his representative capacity is not denied nor any proof given that he had not been appointed.[11]

By special or temporary administrator. A special administrator is properly allowed to become a party to a bill by an heir of decedent against one charged to have fraudulently procured a conveyance from decedent and to have converted personal property.[12] Where complaint for land was brought by one who claimed title to the property sued for under a deed from his mother, it was alleged that the mother had died since the execution of the deed, leaving no property and no administrator, and that defendants named in the petition, together with plaintiff, were all of the heirs at law of decedent, one showing that he was the duly appointed and qualified temporary administrator of decedent, and that he was in possession of the property sued for, was, upon his intervention duly filed praying that he be made a party defendant, properly allowed to become a party defendant to such suit.[13]

By succeeding representative. Where, upon the filing of a bill by one coexecutor against another, complainant filed a petition to remove his coexecutor, which was met by an answer and a cross petition for the same relief with reference to complainant, whereupon the probate court removed both and appointed an administrator with the will annexed, the latter was entitled to intervene and maintain the bill alone for the benefit of the estate.[14]

By creditor. In a suit by a creditor against a personal representative to recover a claim against the estate, other creditors have no right to intervene and become codefendants.[15] In a suit by an administrator to recover a fund belonging to the estate, it is proper to allow a creditor seeking to charge the fund with the payment of a debt to intervene.[16]

By legatee. Where a disputed claim against an estate has been referred under the statute and the proceeding has assumed the status of an action in the supreme court, a legatee cannot intervene on the ground of collusion between the administrator and the claimant and consequent danger to his legacy.[17]

Miscellaneous. One who acquired from decedent's heirs decedent's interest in real estate may intervene and defend a claim against the estate.[18] Where a bill was filed to marshal the assets of an insolvent estate and among the debts due by decedent was one due as guardian of his two daughters both of whom were married at the death of the father, and the husband of one of the daughters was a party to the original bill, and was charged with wasting the assets to a large amount, and pending these proceedings the two daughters by their next friend came in and were made parties by petition setting up the debt due them by their father and praying that it should be settled to their sole use, and before any final decree one of the daughters died leaving minor children it was held that the right to a settlement was sufficiently asserted by the mother during her lifetime to authorize the children to come in by petition and assert the right for their own benefit as survivors.[19] In a proceeding by the administrator of an intestate estate for interpleader against several defendants claiming to be heirs, and in this respect contesting with each other, the superior court has no jurisdiction to determine whether the estate has escheated, and therefore one who claims an interest in the estate only in the event that there are no heirs has no right to be made a party defendant by intervention for the purpose of showing that none of the defendants are heirs, and that the estate has escheated.[20] Where an equity suit in the nature of a creditor's bill was brought against a decedent and others, and an award of a distributive share of decedent's estate had been made by the orphans' court to one of defendants in the equity suit, but such defendant had received and misappropriated certain stocks which belonged to decedent and the master in the equity suit had recommended a decree against her, and by reason of these facts complainant in the equity suit asked a special lien on the award to the distributee and asked to intervene in a petition filed by the executor in the orphans' court, which latter petition set forth the above facts and further set forth that defendant distributee would be unable to reimburse the estate in case a final decree was rendered against her in the equity proceeding and the estate had to pay the amount thereof, it was held that the complainant in the equity suit should be permitted to intervene in the proceeding in the orphans' court.[21]

[§ 2045] 25. Joinder of Personal Representatives in Actions by Legatees or Distributees. Where the legatee of an undivided half interest in a firm and the executors contracted in writing under seal with decedent's partner for a final accounting of the firm's business, the agreement providing that upon violation of its provisions by either party the other should be entitled to recover liquidated damages, although the legatee was the legal owner of the bequest by reason of the executor's assignmnt thereof to him, the executors had an interest in the liquidated damage clause and in the other undivided half of the firm's assets in an adjustment of the accounts, and the legatee could not assign the cause of action belonging to himself and the executors jointly, or sue alone, and hence the legatee's assignee could not sue without joining the executors.[22]

[§ 2046] 26. Effect of Death of Personal Representative[23]—a. Actions by Personal Representative. At common law all personal actions abated by the death of either party before judgment,[24] but by virtue of statutory provisions the rule is almost universal that, where suit is brought by a personal representative, and he dies pending suit, it does not abate on his death.[25] Where the personal representative sues in his individual capacity, the suit, on his death, must be continued in the name of his personal representative and not in the name of his successor,[26] but where the cause of action is such that the representative can only sue on it in his representative capacity, it must be continued, after his death, by his successor in office.[27] Where the personal representative sues in his representative capacity on a cause of action which he could sue on either individually or as representative and the amount recovered would be assets of the estate, it has been held that on his death suit should be continued by his successor;[28] but it has also been held that under such circumstances the suit may be revived either in the name of the administrator de bonis non or of the administrator of the deceased representative.[29]

[a] Illustration.—Where an administrator sues in his individual capacity and recovers judgment and after issuance of execution thereon an affidavit of illegality is filed and

Where the representative dies after recovering judgment for a debt due to the estate, the administrator de bonis non is properly substituted as plaintiff for the purpose of enforcing the judgment;[30] but it has been held that, where at the time of the death of the representative, pending scire facias on a judgment obtained by him, the estate had been fully settled and the debts paid, the proceeding may be revived in the name of the distributees.[31]

[§ 2048] c. [a] Where an administrator continues an action commenced by decedent and dies, the administrator de bonis non is the only proper party to continue the action. Stephenson v. Peebles, 77 N. C. 364.

[b] Creditors cannot continue a suit originally brought by the administrator against the heirs to have land sold to make assets. On the death of the administrator, suit can only be continued by the administrator de bonis non. Brittain v. Dickson, 111 N. C. 529, 16 SE 326.

[c] Where an administrator de bonis non declines to prosecute an action in which the administrator was plaintiff, one who makes affidavit that the suit was originally brought for his use is not entitled to be made plaintiff, but on giving indemnity to secure costs he is entitled to have the administrator de bonis non made plaintiff, and the action prosecuted in his name. Stephenson v. Peebles, 77 N. C. 364.

[d] Prerequisites to continuance of suit.—Under a statute requiring a public administrator to give bond and take out letters of administration in each particular case before he is invested with any control over the estate, a public administrator has no authority to prosecute a suit commenced by an administrator who has died until he has given bond and taken out letters of administration in the case of that particular estate. [a] Suits to recover legacies. — (1) If one of two coexecutors has died, his personal representatives are not necessary parties to a bill to recover a legacy (Dehart v. Dehart, 3 N. J. Eq. 471; Richardson v. Richardson, 9 Pa. 428); (2) especially where it charges that all the assets of the testator are in the hands of the surviving executor (Goble v. Andruss, 2 N. J. Eq. 66). (3) But such representatives are proper parties whenever the deceased executor is charged with having assets or where fraud and collusion are charged between the executors or in a case of insolvency. Goble v. Andruss, 2 N. J. Eq. 66.

[b] Effect of want of service on survivor. — Where an action is brought against two executors and service is had on one for whom there is a special appearance, a trial and judgment after the death of the executor on whom the writ was served is erroneous, the other executor never having been in court as a party, it would be unjust to permit plaintiff to hold him as such.

erly continued by or against the survivor or survivors,[45] and it is error to revive the suit against the representatives of the deceased representative.[46] The widow of an intestate cannot come into court on an open unliquidated claim against the representative of one administrator while there is another living, nor can she do so even upon a joint judgment or decree previously obtained against both.[47]

[§ 2049] 27. Effect of Resignation, Removal, or Discharge of Personal Representative. The resignation, removal, or discharge of a personal representative pending a suit brought by him does not operate to abate the action,[48] although after his removal he cannot himself continue the suit.[49] The suit should be continued in the name of his successor in office,[50] and the cause cannot be proceeded with further until the latter is made a party.[51] The same rules apply where a personal representative dies pending a suit against him.[52] Where letters are revoked because the alleged decedent is not dead, he is entitled to be substituted as a party without terms.[53]

[§ 2050] 28. Effect of Marriage of Executrix or Administratrix. It is a well settled common-law rule that if a feme sole who has been appointed a personal representative subsequently marries, her husband becomes coexecutor or coadministrator with her,[54] or as it is sometimes expressed he becomes executor in her right;[55] and in actions or suits subsequently brought by or against either in a representative capacity, the other is a necessary party.[56] It has been held, however, that in cases where an administrator may be charged in his own right the action lies against the husband alone;[57] and that if a bond is given to a husband and wife, who is administratrix, the husband may declare on it alone as a bond made to himself.[58] Where there are several personal representatives, one of whom is a married woman, she should be joined with the other representatives whether she was constituted one before or after marriage,[59] and her husband should be joined in an action against them.[60] Where a feme sole personal representative marries pending an action commenced by her, the action cannot be allowed to proceed unless the husband is joined as plaintiff,[61] but in the absence of statute providing otherwise the action may proceed if the husband is joined.[62] Where an action is brought against a feme sole representative and she marries, the action may be further prosecuted on making the husband a party,[63] or even, it has been held, without making the husband a party.[64] In a number of jurisdictions, by virtue of statutory enactment, marriage of a feme sole personal representative operates as an extinguishment of her authority,[65] and she cannot further prosecute a suit brought by her,[66] even though her husband join,[67] and if she is one of two joint representatives and the other sues alone it is not necessary to amend by adding her as a party.[68]

[§ 2051] K. Process[69]—1. In General. To give a court jurisdiction to render judgment against a personal representative, service of process on him is necessary;[70] and a recital, in an order making the administrator a party on the death of decedent, that he had been served, does not prevent his showing that he neither was served nor appeared.[71]

Nonresident representatives. Where persons not residents of a state are appointed personal representatives on their petition by a court of that state the court may require them to submit to service of summons in an action to determine the liability of the estate on a claim not provable in course of administration,[72] and nonresident executors are sometimes required by statute, before entering on the duties of their trust, to appoint resident agents on whom process may be served.[73] Service on the sureties on the bond of a nonresident representative is sometimes authorized by statute and given the same effect as though service were made on the representative,[74] and statutory authority is also found by which, when suit is brought upon the bond given by an administrator on a sale of realty and the summons is issued in the county which has control of the account of such administrator, service may be made on his personal representative at the latter's residence outside of the county.[75]

Time of service. Statutory provisions as to the time of serving process must be strictly complied with.[76] Under statutes requiring the service of summons within a year after the commencement of the action, and providing that an action may be commenced against a personal representative within a year after the issuing of letters testamentary or of administration, and the bringing of new parties to an action and the service of summons on them, where an action was properly commenced against the heirs of a decedent to foreclose a mortgage, and an administrator was afterward appointed, the court might order him to be brought in as a party and summons to be served on him over a year after the commencement of the action but within a year of his appointment.[77]

Attachment in suit against heir to charge land. Under a statute imposing a lien in favor of the administrator of a solvent estate upon the share of an heir indebted to the intestate at his death, and making it enforceable by suit and attachment by the administrator within two years after administration granted, the lien to have priority to any other attachment of the share, it has been held that in enforcing the lien by suit and attachment it is not necessary that the writ or the officer's return should contain a description of any particular land to be attached, as the lien is upon the entire share, but it is sufficient if the writ and return show that the attachment is made to enforce the lien, nor is it necessary that the certificate of the attaching officer returned to the register of deeds should contain a statement that plaintiff sues as administrator.[78]

[§ 2052] 2. Coexecutors or Coadministrators. Where suit is brought against two or more personal representatives they must all be served with process in order to make them parties.[79] Service of process on one will not authorize a judgment against all,[80] and according to some decisions service must be made upon all to authorize a judgment against any one of them,[81] although there is also authority for the view that the case may proceed the judgment as to those who were served.[82] The rule requiring service as to all is subject to some limitations. Thus it has been held that if process is served on one and returned "not found" as to the others plaintiff may take judgment against all,[83] and where one is a nonresident process may be served on those who are residents and plaintiff may proceed to judgment against them.[84]

A judgment in a suit against independent executors to recover taxes due on city lots is not rendered void, but at most voidable, if erroneous at all, by failure to serve one of the executors.[85]

[§ 2053] 3. Defects, Objections, and Amendments. A citation may issue against "the estate of [naming decedent]."[86] Process defective for failure to allege defendant's representative capacity may be amended,[87] and process against defendant personally may be amended so as to charge him in a representative capacity.[88] Irregularities in process against a personal representative cannot be taken advantage of by a stranger to the suit.[89] Where a petition alleges that it is brought against a defendant as administratrix of a certain deceased person, and alleges the death of her intestate, her qualification as such administratrix, and her consent to be sued within twelve months from her qualification, and prays the cancellation of certain mortgages executed by her intestate, and other relief against her as administratrix, and where service of a copy of the petition is acknowledged, and process, copy process, and service thereof, and twelve months' exemption from suit are waived in an entry indorsed upon the petition and signed by one as attorney at law for such defendant as administratrix of such deceased person, such defendant as administratrix of her intestate is a party to the suit, notwithstanding the fact that in the prayer for process her representative character is not stated.[90]

of all the subsequent proceedings.[4] An appearance by the executor individually, as attorney for the widow, cannot bind the estate;[5] and an appearance by one executor does not bind a coexecutor.[6] Where an executor is sued in both his individual and his representative capacity he is entitled to appear in each capacity by a different attorney.[7] Where an action is brought against a nonresident executor of a foreign estate and lands in which defendant has no interest other than as executor are attached in the action and service obtained upon the foreign executor by publication, and he files an answer defending for the estate, the court acquires no jurisdiction to render a judgment against him individually, notwithstanding the allegations of the petition or the fact that he may have incurred a personal liability to plaintiff on the claim sued on.[8]

[§ 2055] M. Joinder of Causes of Action—1. Actions by Personal Representatives—a. Causes of Action in Individual and in Representative Capacity—(1) In General. An executor or administrator cannot join a cause of action in his individual right with a cause of action in his representative capacity,[9] for the courts will not take cognizance of distinct and separate claims or liabilities of different persons in the same action.[10] The rule applies to suits in equity as well as actions at law.[11] It has been held, however, that a complaint showing a good cause of action in plaintiff in his individual capacity and for the estate which he represents, each arising under the same contract, and demanding specific performance and damages, is not demurrable;[12] and where a statute authorizes the uniting in the same complaint of several causes of action when they all arise out of the same transaction or transactions connected with the same subject of action, provided they affect all the parties to the action, plaintiff may unite a cause of action as executrix with one as devisee where both accrue under a contract made by the testator with defendant growing out of the same matter.[13]

[§ 2056] (2) How Misjoinder Availed of. The objection that a personal representative has joined a cause of action in his individual capacity with one in his representative capacity, although it is pleadable in abatement,[14] is fatal also in every stage of the suit.[15] The declaration is bad on demurrer, motion in arrest, and on error.[16]

[§ 2057] b. Causes of Action Accruing to Decedent and to Representative in Representative Capacity. While it was formerly held that an executor or administrator could not join a cause of action accruing to decedent with one accruing to himself in his representative capacity,[17] the present rule is that such counts may be joined whenever the money recovered will be assets.[18] But in order to authorize a joinder it must be alleged that the cause of action arising after decedent's death accrued to plaintiff

Thereafter defendant served a notice of appearance as executor, demanding a copy of the complaint, which notice was signed by A, attorney for defendant, as executor. Plaintiff's attorney, not noticing that defendant had appeared as executor by one attorney and individually by another, served a copy of complaint on the attorney for the executor, but none on the attorney for defendant individually. Within twenty days defendant, as executor, served an answer on plaintiff's attorney, who returned it on the ground that defendant, as executor, was in default. It was held that the executor was not in default as claimed. Roche v. O'Connor, 95 App. Div. 496, 88 NYS 968.

[§ 2058] c. Counts for Goods of Representative and for Goods of Decedent. As a personal representative may sue in his own right on contracts made with him in his representative capacity, he may join counts for goods sold of which he was owner with counts for goods sold which he held as executor.[20]

[§ 2059] d. Miscellaneous. A personal representative of two decedents cannot join in one action causes of action belonging to the two estates.[21] Where the decree of a surrogate's court was against plaintiff as administrator and the docketing and levying reached his individual property, it was proper for plaintiff to sue both in his representative and in his individual capacity in an action to declare the decree satisfied.[22] A bill is not multifarious which is filed by a single complainant as administrator cum testamento annexo of two estates which are so blended and so nearly the same that it is necessary to proceed under both wills at the same time, and which asks the direction of the court, for the complainant's protection, in the construction of the wills, the distribution and administration of the estates, the establishment of certain charitable bequests contained in one of the wills, the marshaling of the assets, and, contingently, contribution from the legatees for the payment of debts.[23]

[§ 2060] 2. Actions against Personal Representatives—a. Causes of Action in Individual and in Representative Capacity—(1) In General. The general rule is that a cause of action against a personal representative in his representative capacity cannot be joined with a cause of action against him in his individual capacity,[24] particularly where

[b] Surplusage.—Where in an action against administrators it is apparent from the whole declaration that defendants are charged in their representative character, it is good on general demurrer, although it also alleges a promise by the administrators. Curtis v. Bowrie, 6 F. Cas. No. 3,498, 2 McLean 374.

one cause of action is legal and the other equitable.[25] This rule is operative in suits in equity as well as in actions at law.[26]

The reason for the rule is that different judgments would be required; the first de bonis testatoris and the other de bonis propriis.[27] There would of necessity be two judgments entirely dissimilar; in the one the assets of decedent's estate would be charged while in the other the estate both real and personal of defendant would be subjected to its payment;[28] and it is only where the counts are of the same nature and the same judgment is to be given on them all that they may be joined.[29]

Statutory modification of rule. It is sometimes permitted by statute that causes of action against a representative personally and in his representative capacity be joined where the cause of action stated is against him in both capacities, where the facts render it uncertain in which capacity the cause of action exists, or where the causes of action grew out of the same transaction or transactions connected with the same subject matter, do not require different places or modes of trial, and are not inconsistent.[30]

[§ 2061] (2) How Misjoinder Availed of. The objection for such misjoinder may be taken advantage of by general demurrer to the whole declaration,[31] or on error.[32] It has also been held that defendant may move to instruct the jury that plaintiff cannot recover because of a misjoinder.[33]

Bonaparte v. State, 63 Md. 465, 475.

Pugsley v. Aikin, 11 N. Y. 494 [rev 14 Barb. 114].

[c] Demands for taxes due before and after decedent's death.—In assumpsit against an executor to recover taxes due on the estate of his testatrix, it is not a misjoinder to unite a count for taxes due by the testatrix in her lifetime with a count for taxes due from the executor on the same property while in his hands as executor. Bonaparte v. State, 63 Md. 465.

"It is true, the precedents furnish only cases where the testator gave birth to the obligation, or received the consideration of the promise, but the reason of the thing applies to all obligations thrown upon the executor by virtue of his office." Gregory v. Hooker, 8 N. C. 394, 407, 9 AmD 646.

of liability and amount thereof on both demands directly in a single suit.[38] A count on promises by decedent and another on promises by decedent alone may be joined, although the surviving promisor is living, where such procedure is authorized by statute.[39] Administrators and executors of different estates and their sureties cannot be made defendants to the same bill, founded on a claim against one estate.[40] Where an administrator, on the death of a distributee, was appointed administrator of the distributee's estate, persons entitled as distributees to a portion of both estates may unite both claims in one bill against the administrator.[41] Where a surviving partner qualifies as administrator of the deceased partner, he may be sued both in his individual and in his representative capacity on an obligation on which he was jointly liable with decedent.[42] If heirs bring suit to annul an administrator's sale of land and at the same time ask that he be ordered to file his account, that he be removed from office, and that they be put in possession of the property of the estate, the demands are not inconsistent with one another.[43] Where an executor is directed by will to sell all real and personal property, the surviving husband's cause of action for an allotment to him of one third of the land for life was properly joined with his cause of action against the executor for one half the surplus personalty.[44] Where plaintiff brought an action to recover a portion of real estate from defendant as executrix of the estate of her husband, allegations that the testator was in possession, holding the same under a lease from plaintiff and that he wrongfully encroached on an additional portion of the premises and occupied the same at the time of his death, which possession had been retained by the executrix ever since, did not show an improper joinder of a cause of action against the executrix in her representative capacity with one against her in her individual capacity.[45] In an action by a widow for the rent of her dower interest after its assignment, the fact that a claim for rent derived from a lease made by her husband during his lifetime was joined with a claim for rent against the administrators personally did not render the bill objectionable as multifarious.[46]

Necessity and Sufficiency of Allegations. If an executor or administrator sues in a representative capacity, it must appear from the declaration, petition, or complaint that the suit is brought by him in such capacity.[49] There is considerable confusion and uncertainty in the decisions as to what is necessary to distinguish when an action is brought in a representative capacity from one brought as an individual.[50] Some decisions hold, seemingly without any qualification, that the mere use of the word "executor" or "administrator" of a designated person following plaintiff's name in the caption or commencement of the pleading sufficiently shows that the suit is brought in a representative capacity;[51] but other cases hold that, where a suit is one which plaintiff may bring either in his individual or representative capacity and the caption of the pleading describes plaintiff, "executor" instead of "as executor," and the body of the pleading contains no averment showing representative capacity, the suit will be considered as brought in plaintiff's individual capacity.[52] There are also decisions which go further and hold that whether the suit is one which plaintiff can bring only in his representative capacity, or is one which may be brought either individually or in his representative capacity his description of himself, "executor" or "administrator," instead of "as executor" or "as administrator," in the caption of the complaint, does not show that suit was brought in a representative capacity, but the contrary.[53] But while it has been said that it is better pleading to describe

[a] Reason for rule.—If plaintiff describes himself as "executor" this only shows that the debt sued on was contracted with him in that character, but does not show that he elected in his suit to treat it as a debt of the estate. On a contract of this character he may sue either in his personal or representative capacity; hence the necessity of showing definitely the character in which he intends to sue. Daniel v. [a] Use of words "as administrators," etc., without naming decedent.—The words "as administrators," following the names of plaintiffs in the marginal statement of the parties and in the commencement of the complaint without an averment of the intestate's name, are mere surplusage, and do not indicate the character in which plaintiffs sue. Ikelheimer v. Chapman, 32 Ala. 676.

plaintiff "as executor" or "as administrator" in the caption or commencement of the pleading,[54] it is very generally held that it will be sufficient if the allegations in the body of the pleading show that plaintiff sues in a representative capacity.[55] In other words, if the title of the action does not declare the character in which plaintiff sues, it may be supplied from the body of the declaration.[56] It follows therefore that, although the caption or commencement describes plaintiff "executor" instead of "as executor," the action will nevertheless be considered as brought in a representative capacity if the allegations of the pleading are sufficient to show such fact,[57] and the same is the case, although the caption contains no descriptive words of any character.[58] Some decisions hold that the words "as executor" or "as administrator" in the caption sufficiently show that suit is brought in a representative capacity and that these words need not be repeated in the body of the pleading;[59] but others hold that no issue can be taken to the description of the parties in the title and that there must be a direct allegation in the body of the pleading that suit is brought in a representative capacity.[60] Where a bill recites that complainant is the administrator of a certain estate, but does not indicate that it is filed by him solely as administrator, the suit will be deemed to be brought by him individually and as administrator.[61] If there are several counts in a declaration and the first describes the cause of action as accruing to plaintiff as executor the other counts need not describe him as executor or allege that the right of action accrued to him as such.[62] Where the declaration shows that the action is brought by plaintiff as executor, it is not material that it concludes to the damage of the plaintiff individually.[63]

An affidavit of demand by a plaintiff, suing in the capacity of an administratrix, need not aver that affiant is the administratrix.[64]

[§ 2066] bbb. Rejection of Descriptive Words as Surplusage. If a personal representative brings suit on a cause of action which he must or may bring in his individual capacity and the pleading states a good cause of action in that capacity, the use of the words "executor or administrator" will be considered merely descriptive of the person and, not being essential in the pleading to his right of recovery, may be rejected as surplusage;[65] but it has been held to be otherwise where the word "as"

precedes the words designating the representative capacity, as the descriptive part is then of substance and cannot be regarded as immaterial.[66] Where an administrator sues properly in his capacity as such, his allegation of another capacity, as for instance that he is attorney in fact for the heirs, may be treated as surplusage.[67] It has been held that, where a declaration alleges in the commencement that plaintiff was decedent's executor and in a subsequent part that he took out letters of administration, the declaration is insufficient, since it fails to show whether plaintiff is executor or administrator,[68] but it has also been considered that a description of plaintiff as administrator in the caption may be disregarded where in the body of the complaint it appears that plaintiff is executor.[69] It has been held that, where the declaration is in a representative capacity, but concludes the ad damnum to the representative personally, it is bad, since it cannot be determined whether the recovery was sought by plaintiff as administrator or in his own right,[70] although there is authority for the contrary view.[71]

[§ 2067] ccc. Amendments. It is generally held that, where a pleading is filed in the name of one suing in his individual capacity, it may be amended so as to make the suit stand in his representative capacity, and vice versa,[72] although there is authority for the contrary view.[73] The logical distinction would seem to be that, where the cause of action

Leathers v. Raburn, 13 Ga. A. 744, 79 SE 946. (4) In trespass quare clausum by an administrator the declaration charged that defendants broke and entered the close of plaintiff "administrator as aforesaid" and throughout alleged the injury to have been done to plaintiff's close. It was held that the quoted words were mere description of the person and that the declaration was in his individual and not his representative capacity. Robbins v. Gillett, 2 Pinn. (Wis.) 439, 2 Chandl. 96.

[b] No amendment is necessary, as the court will consider that the words are not in the declaration. Cotten v. Davis, 48 N. C. 355.

[c] Limitations of rule.—(1) In a complaint to the judge of probate for embezzlement of the estate of a person deceased the complainant having described himself as "administrator and creditor," and it appearing that he was not entitled to act as administrator, it was held that the words "administrator and" were material and could not be rejected as surplusage. "It may have been upon this ground alone that the judge took jurisdiction." Arnold v. Sabin, 4 Cush. (Mass.) 46, 48. (2) Where the words "as administrator of the estate," etc., appeared in the title of action, and the averments in the complaint confirmed the fact that the action was brought by plaintiff in his official capacity, it was held that the words of description could not be rejected as surplusage, and a demurrer was sustained because plaintiff, being a foreign administrator, was not qualified to sue as such. Farrington v. American L. & T. Co., 9 NYS 433, 18 NYCivProc 135.

66. Gilbert v. Hardwick, 11 Ga. 599; Farrington v. American L. & T. Co., 9 NYS 433, 18 NYCivProc 135. "The rule as to descriptio personae, in these cases, is this: if the plaintiff describes himself executor, &c, &c., it is an action in his personal character the descriptive part being regarded as immaterial. But if the plaintiff describes himself, as he has done in this case, as executor &c., then it is an action in his representative character, and the descriptive part is of substance, and cannot be regarded as immaterial. Whether this distinction be with or without reason, it is the rule of the Common Law, and was the rule of the Common Law when we adopted it, and is therefore, obligatory upon this Court." Gilbert v. [a] Reason for rule.—"There is no more identity between a person suing as executor, upon a cause of action accruing to his estate, and is one which might be sued on by the representative in either his individual or his representative capacity, such an amendment is properly allowed,[74] but it should not be allowed where the cause of action is in one capacity only.[75]

[§ 2068] ddd. Effect of Allegations. Where plaintiff sues as an administrator, and his pleadings are not amended to show that he prosecuted the suit in any other capacity, he must be treated as having sued in such capacity alone, and not as trustee of an express trust.[76] An allegation that plaintiff duly qualified as intestate's administrator raises a presumption that plaintiff took the necessary oath.[77] A petition, the caption of which describes plaintiff as independent executor of a decedent, is not a petition of plaintiff in his individual right, where it again mentions plaintiff as a distinct party suing in his own right and thus makes evident an intention to proceed in both capacities.[78]

[§ 2069] (bb) Actions against Personal Representative—aaa. Necessity and Sufficiency of Allegations. In an action against an executor or administrator it is necessary to state that he is sued as executor or administrator if it is sought to hold him liable as such.[79] The word "as" prefixed to the title of defendant indicates that he is sued in his representative capacity.[80] If, however, he is described "executor" without the word "as" prefixed, the word "executor" will be considered merely description of the person and the action will be considered as brought against him in his individual capacity,[81] unless the pleading contains other averments showing that he is sued in his representative capacity, which will be sufficient as no particular form of words is required.[82] With regard to the representative character of defendant plaintiff is not supposed to know the particulars, and it is sufficient to aver in general terms that he is executor or administrator of the particular estate.[83] So where the complaint sufficiently shows that defendant is the administrator of the debtor, it is not necessary to allege whether defendant is a domestic or a foreign administrator,[84] or that he was still acting as administrator when the action was com-the same person suing in his individual capacity, upon a cause of action accruing to himself, than there is between two entirely different persons." Fleming v. Courtenay, 98 Me. 401, 414, 57 A 592, 99 AmSR 414.

Harmon, 69 Me. 29, where a plaintiff was described in the writ as executor, the court held that an amendment could be allowed by striking out the words 'executor, etc.'; but the reason of this, as expressly stated in the opinion, was because the cause of action was described as one accruing to the plaintiff in his own right, and consequently the words allowed to be stricken out were simply descriptio personae. That case is no authority for the power of the court to allow an amendment whereby a new plaintiff would be substituted, or even the same person as plaintiff but in an entirely different capacity").

menced.[85] Defendant need not be described in his representative capacity in the beginning of the declaration if in a subsequent part thereof he is declared against as such.[86] Where the complaint in an action against an executor contains several causes of action separately stated, an allegation showing defendant's representative character need not be contained in each count; one allegation at the conclusion of the complaint is sufficient.[87] An allegation that defendant is the "duly qualified and acting executrix" of the estate of a named decedent "by the due consideration and order of the Surrogate's Court" inferentially sets forth that decedent left a will, that it was duly probated, that defendant was named as executrix, and that she was duly appointed and qualified as such.[88]

Omission to state representative capacity in prayer for process. Where a petition alleges that it is against defendant as administratrix, the death of defendant's intestate, her qualification as administratrix, and her consent to be sued within twelve months from her qualification, and prays the cancellation of mortgages executed by intestate and other relief against defendant as administratrix, and where service of the petition is acknowledged, and process and service thereof, and the twelve months' exemption from suit is waived in an entry indorsed on the petition and signed by one as attorney for defendant, as administratrix, such defendant, as administratrix, is the party to the suit, notwithstanding in the prayer for process her representative character is not stated.[89]

A complaint in intervention in an action of ejectment brought by an executor need not allege plaintiff's status as executor, where such status is fully alleged in plaintiff's complaint.[90]

[§ 2070] bbb. Rejection of Descriptive Words as Surplusage. Where suit is brought against a personal representative on a cause of action for which he can be held liable only in his individual capacity, the pleading is not vitiated by describing him therein as executor or administrator, but such description may be rejected as surplusage,[91] because the naming of defendant as executor or administrator neither adds to nor diminishes his individual responsibility and is matter of form and not of substance.[92] So where an action is brought, the object of which is to charge defendant individually and a legal ground for the individual liability of the representative is set forth in the pleading, the fact that he was named therein as executor does not vitiate the pleading and this allegation may be treated as surplusage,[93] and it has been said that under these circumstances it is not improper to name defendant as administrator by way of description or for the purpose of showing the circumstances of the transaction and the origin of the liability.[94] It has been held, however, that, where the descriptive words are preceded by the word "as," the action cannot be regarded as against the representative individually.[95]

[a] Discretion in allowing amendment.—On failure to recover against executors as such the court is not bound to allow plaintiff to amend his petition so as to make a case against them as individuals, it not being shown to be in furtherance of justice, and such amendment sub-capacity as executor or administrator.[97] In an action against an executor as such on a note executed by him as executor the complaint may be amended on demurrer filed for failure to show a cause of action against him as executor by adding counts stating an indebtedness by testator in his lifetime and striking out the count on the note described in the original complaint.[98] If defendant is improperly described as a personal representative of the estate of a person designated when he is in fact the administrator of the estate of another person, this is a mere misdescription of the representative capacity and may be amended.[99]

[§ 2073] (cc) Mode of Objection. If plaintiff's incapacity to sue in a representative capacity does not clearly appear from the statement of the declaration or complaint, the objection cannot be taken by demurrer but only by plea or answer,[2] or motion to make the allegation more certain and specific.[3] But if the declaration or complaint shows on its face that plaintiff has not capacity to sue as a personal representative, objection must be taken by demurrer or it will be considered waived.[4] The objection cannot be raised by general demurrer,[5] but only by special demurrer.[6]

[b] On demurrer (1) an action against defendants "as executors," demanding a judgment against them "as executors," cannot be converted into an action against defendants individually. Austin v. Munroe, 47 N. Y. 360. (2) This case was referred to in Sterrett v. Barker, 119 Cal. 492, 51 P. 695, as holding "that the complaint cannot be amended so as to constitute an action against the executor individually." (3) But in making this statement the California court overlooked the fact that the judgment of the New York court was that the demurrer to the complaint against defendants "as executors" should be sustained "with leave to the plaintiffs to amend on payment of costs." Austin v. Munroe, supra.

[c] After the trial (1) a summons and complaint entitled against defendants "as" executor cannot be amended and judgment entered against defendant individually, as such amendment would substitute a new and different cause of action against which defendant, as an individual, had been furnished no opportunity to defend. Van Cott v. Prentice, 104 N. Y. 45, 10 NE 257 [aff 35 Hun 317]. (2) Where the declaration alleges promises by the intestate, plaintiff cannot recover for services after his death, but after a full trial and a referee's report in plaintiff's favor under such counts, plaintiff may be permitted to amend by adding the proper counts on paying costs of the motion to set aside the report. [§ 2075] (bb) Sufficiency.[10] No particular form of words is absolutely essential to show plaintiff's authority to sue in a representative character, but the fact must appear substantially so that issue may be made upon the allegation if proper to do so.[11] The pleading must allege the appointment of plaintiff as executor or administrator,[12] or facts from which appointment will be necessarily inferred.[13] It has been held that a mere statement that plaintiff was duly appointed executor or administrator is sufficient,[14] but this is denied in other cases.[15] A proper and sufficient way to show authority is to allege that plaintiff is executor or administrator by virtue of letters issued by a probate court of some county, giving the name of the court and the time at which the letters were issued.[16] It is not necessary to set forth the facts showing that the probate court had jurisdiction.[17] While it would be better to allege directly that letters testamentary or of administration have been issued,[18] such allegation is unnecessary if this fact appears from other facts stated.[19] It has been held that acceptance of the trust and qualification need not be alleged, as both are implied in the grant and issuance of letters testamentary,[20] but there is also authority for the view that such an allegation is necessary.[21] In a suit to enjoin a sale under a trust deed brought by an executor, a petition which alleges that plaintiff is the qualified independent executor of the will of decedent, that the will has been duly probated in the probate court of a designated county, and that independent administration by the executor has been continuously and is still open and pending, and that there has been no distribution of the estate, sufficiently shows the executor's authority to prosecute the suit, without alleging the condition of the estate, the time of his qualification, the terms of the will, what act he is performing, and sufficiently shows why the heirs do not prosecute.[22] A plea in an action on notes executed by an independent executor for money borrowed to carry on decedent's business, alleging that at the time of the death of decedent the name averred to be signed to the notes was a partnership composed of decedent and other persons, that the partnership was dissolved by the death of decedent, and no authority existed in any of the surviving partners to execute notes binding decedent's estate, relates merely to the authority of a surviving partner to execute such notes, and not to the authority of one of the alleged partners as executor of decedent.[23]

In an action by an administrator de bonis non, the complaint must state the name of the former representative and allege nonpayment to him;[24] and it should also allege his death or resignation, the revocation of his letters, or his discharge by the court.[25]

[b] A complaint on a note by an assignee of a nonresident executor is demurrable as failing to state sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action, where it fails to allege that the will has been probated in the state where the action is brought. [b] Sufficient showing as to county of appointment.—Where it appears from the caption of a complaint that the action was in a certain county and it alleges the appointment of plaintiff as administrator in such county, it is sufficient as against an objection that it fails to set forth the county in which the appointment was made which is made for the first time on appeal. Hughes v. Meehan, 84 Minn. 226, 87 NW 768.

[c] Failure to show probate and qualification.—Where a complaint contains the allegations indicated in the text, a demurrer on the ground that it does not show the probate of the will and qualification of the executor before suit brought is frivolous. Hurst v. Addington, 84 N. C. 143.

[d] Failure to allege date of death.—In an action by an administratrix, an allegation that her decedent died intestate, and that on a certain date plaintiff was appointed administratrix of decedent's estate was not objectionable for failure to allege the date of decedent's death and by reason thereof failing to show that deceased did not die until after plaintiff was appointed administratrix of his estate since such a contingency would not be presumed. [a] Where an estate has been under the charge of two administrators, the petition in a suit by an administrator de bonis non should show that the administration of both has been brought to a close. State v. Green, 65 Mo. 528.

[b] Allegations held sufficient.—A complaint alleging testator's death, the probate of his will, the issuance of letters to his executors, their resignation, and the acceptance thereof by the court, that plaintiff was appointed administrator by the probate court of a designated county, that he qualified and that letters

Continuance of authority. Where a complaint in an action by an administrator shows that plaintiff was appointed as administrator only six days before the action was brought, and it is not shown that he has since been discharged, it need not be alleged that he is still qualified to act as administrator.[26] If the suit is brought by an administrator durante absentia, it must be alleged that the executor continued absent at the time of bringing the action.[27]

[§ 2076] cc. Allegations Showing Defendant's Authority to Act as Personal Representative.[28] According to some decisions, where a person is sued as executor or administrator, the pleading must allege his appointment as such and that he was acting in that capacity,[29] but the more generally accepted view is that it is sufficient to allege that the suit is brought against defendant in his representative capacity without setting forth facts to show that he has authority to act in that capacity.[30] It is not necessary to negative every ground of disqualification of defendant.[31] An allegation in an action against an executor that letters testamentary were duly issued to him, who then duly qualified and acted as such, is not objectionable as a mere conclusion of law in the absence of special demurrer, especially where admitted in the answer.[32]

[§ 2078] bb. Against Personal Representative. It is not necessary that a defendant to a bill in equity sought to be charged as a personal representative be described as executor or administrator in the process,[45] or in the commencement or conclusion of the bill,[46] where the bill sets forth facts sufficient to show that he is liable in that capacity. A bill alleging the death of a designated person and that defendant was thereafter appointed and acted as his administratrix sufficiently charges defendant's representative capacity.[47] A further allegation that he accepted the trust is not necessary.[48] Title to revive the suit against defendant is not shown by the mere statement that such defendant is the representative of a party who had answered the original bill.[49]

in his individual capacity it is unnecessary for him to make profert of his letters testamentary or of administration.[50] Many decisions lay down the rule without qualification that, where an executor or administrator sues as such, he must make profert of his letters testamentary or of administration.[51] Others hold that, where the suit is one which must be brought in a representative capacity, plaintiff must make profert of his letters.[52] There are, however, decisions holding that profert is only necessary where suit must be brought in a representative capacity.[53] In some jurisdictions independently of any statutory provisions profert has never been necessary;[54] in others it has been dispensed with by express statutory provisions,[55] and in some of the code states, where the question has arisen, it has been declared that, whatever the common-law rule might have been, it is no longer necessary to make profert.[56] Where a declaration by an administrator contains an averment of grant to him of letters of administration, with mention of their date and the officer by whom granted, the want of profert of the letters of administration is not a defect of sufficient importance to authorize striking out the declaration.[57]

[§ 2080] bb. Object and Effect. The object of profert is to notify defendant not only of the character plaintiff asserts but of the source of his authority,[58] and to afford him an opportunity of taking advantage of any impropriety in the granting of the letters or of any defect to which they may be liable.[59] The effect of profert is to bring the letters testamentary or of administration into court and it operates the same as if they had been set out in the declaration.[60] The profert of the letters of administration in construction of law places them in the hands of the court of whom oyer is craved and not of the party, and the court is sufficiently informed of the right to sue and that the letters were granted by the proper jurisdiction by the inspection of them.[61]

[§ 2081] cc. Form[62] and Requisites. A formal statement in the declaration or complaint that plaintiff brings into court letters showing his qualification as executor or administrator is sufficient,[63] without alleging that the will had been proved or showing by what authority it had been admitted to probate,[64] and if defendant desires to question the validity of the probate or the regularity of the grant of letters he should crave oyer and make them part of the record.[65] Where letters of administration had been granted to the predecessor of one suing as administrator, the profert should set forth such facts and that the letters had been revoked.[66] Where the original declaration makes profert, it is not essential that the amended declaration repeat such a profert.[67]

Variance. Where plaintiff makes profert of letters of administration as having been granted to him by the probate court of a particular county, and those given on oyer were granted to him by the clerk of such court in vacation, the variance is immaterial.[68]

[§ 2082] dd. Effect of Failure to Make Profert Reaching or Curing Defect. Failure to make profert renders the pleading fatally defective on special demurrer,[69] but it has been held that this defect cannot be reached otherwise than by special demurrer.[70] It has also been held that failure to make profert is not a ground for demurrer, but the defect should be reached by a rule to produce the letters or a copy thereof.[71] Objection for want of profert is waived by pleading to the merits.[72] A want of profert is cured by verdict,[73] and an arrest of judgment will not be granted because of such defect.[74] Neither will an objection for lack of profert be entertained when presented for the first time in an appellate court.[75] The fact that the administrator was made a party after abatement of the suit by the death of plaintiff does not alter the rule.[76] Although objection for failure to make profert is properly raised, it may be cured by amendment.[77]

[§ 2083] (b) Oyer. Although plaintiffs name themselves administrators yet if they have not made profert of their letters of administration they are not bound to give oyer of them.[78] If profert is unnecessarily made, it may be treated as surplusage and plaintiff is not bound to produce them on prayer of oyer,[79] even though he sues in his representative character.[80] Nevertheless if he grants oyer of them, they become part of the record and defendant may avail himself of any defense in reference to them that he could have done had oyer been necessarily granted of them in the first instance.[81] Where plaintiff sues in a representative character and necessarily makes profert of his letters, defendant is entitled as a matter of right to a grant of oyer of them,[82] provided the demand therefor is seasonably made. Demand is in time if made before the expiration of the time to plead had expired,[83] but it cannot be made after issue joined.[84] Where demand is seasonably made, the declaration is not complete until oyer has been furnished,[85] and failure to produce the letters on demand puts an end to the suit.[86] Upon filing the prayer of oyer of the letters of administration it is the duty of plaintiff to respond thereto as to any other pleading;[87] but the court upon application and a proper showing has the discretionary power to grant plaintiff a reasonable time to respond to the prayer of oyer.[88] On grant of oyer the letters testamentary or a certified copy of them without the proof establishing the will is sufficient prima facie evidence of the authority of the representative to sue.[89] Certificates attached to the letters need not be shown as they form no part of the letters and are merely evidence.[90] On production of the letters defendant may take any exceptions to them by pleading or otherwise which he may think proper.[91] By demurring to the declaration defendant may reach any substantial defect apparent on the face of the letters,[92] and may thus take advantage of any material variance between the letters produced on oyer and the statement of them in the declaration.[93] Defendant may avail himself of plaintiff's want of title by plea where the defects are not such as can be reached by demurrer,[94] and if oyer has been seasonably demanded, a plea to plaintiff's capacity to sue as soon as the letters have been filed is in time.[95]

[§ 2084] (3) Allegations Negativing Premature Commencement of Suit.[96] It has been held that the declaration or complaint in an action against a personal representative must show that the suit is brought after expiration of the period during which the personal representative is protected from suit, or that it is within the exceptions provided by the statute granting exemption;[97] but there is also authority for the contrary view.[98]

Declaration.[99] If plaintiff sues in his individual capacity and the process is to answer to him "as administrator" there is such a variance as will justify a plea in abatement.[1] But it is not a material variance that the writ describes a party as administrator and the declaration describes him as administrator with the will annexed.[2] A variance between the relief asked and that specified in the citation is amendable.[3]

[§ 2086] b. Plea or Answer—(1) Denial of Representative Capacity—(a) Plea of Ne Unques Executor or Ne Unques Administrator—aa. Propriety or Necessity of Plea. At common law, where plaintiff sues as executor or administrator for any cause of action accruing in the lifetime of his testator or intestate, and makes profert of his letters testamentary or of administration, if defendant would controvert his representative character by reason of any extrinsic matter, he must put it in issue by a plea of ne unques executor or ne unques administrator,[4] which is, in effect, an assertion by defendant that he can be held answerable, if at all, only to one having lawful authority to sue, which plaintiff has not.[5] The language of many decisions is broad enough to indicate that a special plea is necessary whether the cause of action arose in decedent's lifetime or after his death,[6] although others recognize a limitation of the rule in certain causes of action arising after decedent's death.[7] Such a plea is not good where plaintiff sues in his individual capacity,[8] nor may it be interposed where he sues on a contract made with himself in his representative capacity, irrespective of whether he sues individually or in his representative capacity.[9]

Where one is sued as the personal representative of another, he may plead ne unques executor or ne unques administrator;[10] but it has been held that, where upon the death of a defendant a person comes in and acknowledges service of a bill of revivor as administrator, it is too late for him at a subsequent term to plead that he never was administrator.[11]

[§ 2087] bb. Nature of Plea. While the plea of ne unques executor or ne unques administrator has been regarded as a plea in abatement,[12] the more generally accepted view is that it is a plea in bar,[13] for the reason that the plea cannot give plaintiff a better writ but defeats the action absolutely by establishing the fact that he is not the representative of decedent.[14] Nevertheless it has been held that if the plea begins and concludes in abatement, it will be considered a plea in abatement.[15] The view has also been advanced that the plea may be considered one which may be set up either in bar or in abatement.[16]

[§ 2088] cc. Requisites and Sufficiency of Plea. A plea not denying the averment that letters of administration were issued but stating facts to show that they should not have been granted is bad on demurrer.[17] A plea alleging only that defendant was not executor at the time suit was brought is insufficient, as it should be alleged that defendant never was executor and that he never administered on any of the goods and chattels belonging to deceased at the time of his death.[18] An answer denying that plaintiff had capacity to sue does not put in issue plaintiff's appointment as administrator as alleged in the petition.[19] A plea alleging that plaintiff's intestate was a nonresident at the time of his death and had no effects in the state at that time does not show that the letters are void for want of jurisdiction in the court granting them.[20] It has been held, however, that the allegation that plaintiff has been duly appointed administrator, etc., is put in issue by an answer denying the complaint and "each and every part and portion thereof."[21] A denial of an allegation that letters of administration were duly issued has been held to raise an issue as to the jurisdiction of the surrogate's court.[22]

Verification. That a plea denying plaintiff's capacity to sue as the personal representative of a decedent must be verified has been both asserted[23] and denied.[24] It has been held that one who is sued as administrator need not deny his representative capacity under oath.[25]

[c] Where letters are void.—A plea alleging facts which show plaintiff's letters of administration are void for want of jurisdiction in the court by which they were issued is a good plea in bar. Watson v. Collins, 37 Ala. 587; Epping v. Robinson, 21 Fla. 36.

"The question is, can ne unques executor be pleaded in bar of an action brought by an executor for a cause of action accruing in the lifetime of the testator? We are not aware that this question has ever been directly answered in the negative by any decided case, in which it formed the subject-matter of adjudication. It is true, the old books contain forms and instances of such a plea in abatement; and dicta have found their way into the books, that it can be pleaded only in that form. There are instances, too, and of a later date, in which it has been pleaded in bar, and issue taken upon it, without question of its validity. Stokes v. Bate, 5 B. & C. 491, 11 ECL 554, 108 Reprint 183; Thompson v. Reynolds, 3 C. & P. 123, 14 ECL 484. Upon the authority of the former of these cases, Chitty has given the form of this plea in bar, 3 Chitty Pldg. 941, and it is not among his precedents in abatement. Sergeant Williams, in commenting upon a case in Yeomans v. Bradshaw, Carth. 373, 90 Reprint 817, in which the plea denying the character of the plaintiff as administrator was in abatement, condemns that form of pleading, and insists that it should have been in bar. The reason assigned by him is that every plea in abatement must give a better writ, whereas a plea denying the character of the plaintiff as administrator shows that he has no right to sue at all in that capacity. Rex v. Sutton, 1 Saund. 274, n. 3. Without deciding that the plea in question would not be good in abatement, we conceive that on principle and authority it is good in bar; and this view of the matter is in accordance with the case of Weathers v. Newman, 1 Blackf. (Ind.) 232." Codding v. Whitaker, supra.

as executor or administrator determines pending suit by reason of his resignation, removal, or discharge, this fact must be brought to the knowledge of the court by a plea in abatement puis darrein continuance or a judgment rendered against defendant will bind him.[31] Suit cannot be dismissed on the mere suggestion that plaintiff has been removed as administrator.[32] On the other hand if one is sued as executor he may plead puis darrein continuance that he has been removed or discharged.[33] It has been held that this abates the suit,[34] but it has also been considered that such a plea is a good plea in bar.[35] It has also been said that such a plea is not a plea in bar of the suit but in bar of its further maintenance.[36] To take advantage of such facts, it is necessary that they should be pleaded puis darrein continuance,[37] in default of which a judgment should be entered on a verdict against defendant.[38]

tion by a personal representative in his capacity as such, a plea to the merits admits his representative capacity and obviates the necessity of proving it and the weight of authority sustains this view.[45] While it is true that most of these decisions were in cases where the cause of action arose prior to decedent's death, the language of the decisions was broad enough to include all causes of action sued on by the representative in his capacity as such, and some cases have expressly declared that the rule is applicable, although the cause of action arose after death.[46] There are, however, decisions which recognize a limitation of the rule in certain classes of actions arising subsequent to decedent's death; thus it has been held that if the representative brings an action of trover or detinue counting on his own possession instead of that of decedent he must, whether he sues in his individual or representative capacity, show title in himself to the property sued for, although defendant has pleaded to the merits, and that this can only be done by producing competent evidence of his appointment as executor or administrator,[47] and it has also been held that, where an administrator declares in ejectment upon his own seizin, it is essential for him to prove his appointment as such as part of his title in order to make out his case.[48] Where one who is sued as executor or administrator pleads to the merits, plaintiff need not prove defendant's representative capacity.[49]

[a] Reason for rule.—Preliminary objections like the denial of plaintiff's right to be heard in court or the want of capacity in either of the parties should be interposed and determined in limine. The rules of pleading demand that such defenses should be heard before the merits are reached so as to prevent unnecessary costs and delay. Stewart v. Smith, 98 Me. 104, 56 A 401; Clark v. Pishon, 31 Me. 503.

[b] The rule applies whether the action be ex contractu or ex delicto. Hutchinson v. Bobo, 17 S. C. L. 546.

[c] Limitations of rule. — Although a plea of the general issue in a suit by an administrator is an admission of plaintiff's right to sue, the same rule does not apply where the cause is revived in the name of an administrator after the plea has been filed. In such a case the representative character of plaintiff is in issue in the trial and defendant may disprove it. Vickery v. Beir, 16 Mich. 50.

[d] The general issue may be rejected in an action by one suing in a representative capacity if it purports to reserve to defendant the right of denying that plaintiff is administrator. Clarke v. Pishon, 31 Me. 503.

[e] Admissibility of facts not inconsistent with admission.—Although defendant, by pleading over to the action, admits generally the right of plaintiff to sue as administrator, yet he is not thereby precluded from giving in evidence a fact not inconsistent with that admission, namely, that the administrator has no right to recover because there is an executor. to discharge the judgment recovered,[53] his liability being fixed by the presumption that if there had not been assets sufficient he would have pleaded it in the first instance.[54] The rule is, however, subject to the limitation that, when from the nature of the proceedings the personal representative has not had the opportunity of making the defense previous to the rendition of a decree against him, he has the right to plead fully administered to a scire facias sued out to charge him de bonis propriis,[55] and in some decisions it has been held that the rule in equity differs from the rule at law and that in a court of equity assets in the representative's hands must be alleged and if denied or not admitted must be proved.[56] Where there is a suggestion of insolvency, it seems that a failure to plead plene administravit does not admit assets,[57] and it has been held that unless the declaration alleges that assets came into defendant's hands a plea of plene administravit is not necessary.[58]

If a personal representative is sued in his individual capacity he cannot plead plene administravit.[59]

Where a defendant dies when the cause is at issue and his personal representative is brought in to defend, plene administravit is not a proper plea.[60]

[§ 2095] (bb) Effect of Statutes. Statutes in some jurisdictions have modified or abrogated the common-law rule; thus, under statutes providing that neither mispleading nor lack of pleading shall render an executor or administrator personally liable, failure to plead plene administravit does not constitute an admission of assets;[61] and in an action on a judgment suggesting a devastavit, defendant may show that he has fully administered, although he failed to plead plene administravit.[62] Where by statute the effect of a judgment against a personal representative merely establishes the debt against the estate to be paid in due course of administration and the creditor is not entitled to execution against the representative or the property of decedent, the plea of plene administravit is in effect abolished and is neither necessary nor effectual.[63] Where the statute makes it the duty of the administrator to inventory and sell real estate when necessary to pay debts no such plea as plene administravit, without showing a dividend, is good except in one particular case—where the privileged debts have absorbed the whole estate.[64]

[§ 2096] bb. Special Plea. Where defendant admits a balance in his hands of a certain sum he must plead specially, plene administravit præter, that except such sum he has fully administered,[65] and the same is the case where he sets up the right of retainer of the sum admitted for the payment of other debts to which they are legally appropriated or has paid debts of an inferior nature without notice of plaintiff's claim.[66] It has been said that these are the only cases in which a special plea of plene administravit is necessary,[67] but it has also been said that pleas of this character are appropriate and necessary wherever a general plea of plene administravit would be appropriate and necessary, and when they are made it is erroneous to disregard them.[68]

[c] Effect of repeal of statute conferring authority.—Where pending suit against an ordinary who had taken charge of a derelict estate, the statute by virtue of which he acquired authority was repealed, a plea setting up such repeal in abatement was insufficient without a further plea of plene administravit or plene administravit præter. and it has been held that this will be sufficient without a further formal allegation that defendant has fully administered the goods of decedent,[71] although this averment is found in the form of plea given by Chitty in his work on pleading.[72] The plea should also allege that at the time when the assets were administered defendant did not know of the existence of the claim of plaintiff as a creditor.[73] The plea need not allege that there was no real estate of decedent at the time of his death to be administered,[74] unless the statute makes real estate assets in the hands of the representative, in which case a plea that defendant has fully administered the personal estate is insufficient.[75] If required by statute or rule of court, the plea should be accompanied by a full and particular account of his administration with a certified copy of the inventory and appraisement.[76] If defendant pleads plene administravit præter, it is usual to state some certain sum as the value of the goods, but this allegation is not material and traversable.[77] It has been held that a plea of plene administravit should not conclude to the country but with a verification,[78] but it has also been held that such a plea need not be verified.[79] If pleaded singly it need not be signed by counsel;[80] but if pleaded with the general issue it must be so signed.[81] If a plea amounts to no more than a plea of plene administravit allegations not essential to its validity will be disregarded as surplusage.[82]

[§ 2098] (c) Time of Pleading. Defendant may in the discretion of the court be permitted to plead plene administravit after plea of the general issue,[83] or issue joined on some other plea,[84] or, it has been held, at any time before judgment,[85] provided plaintiff suffers no disadvantage by reason of defendant's failure to plead it earlier.[86] He may plead plene administravit, although several terms have elapsed, if he alleges that he can show that he had no assets at the time suit was commenced or at any time since.[87] Where the declaration in an action on a judgment recovered against the administrator suggests a devastavit which accrued after rendition of the judgment, the executor may plead a special plene administravit.[88] Where a reference is had on a plea of plene administravit and a report made charging him with assets, he cannot at a subsequent term be allowed to strike out the plea and plead plene administravit anew;[89] nor can he plead fully administered since the last continuance.[90]

[§ 2099] (d) Time to Which Plea Relates. Every plea of plene administravit must have reference to the commencement of the action or at least to the time of service of the process,[91] in the absence of statutory provisions changing the rule.[92] Defendant cannot avail himself of voluntary payment of a debt after notice of a writ sued out.[93]

[§ 2100] (e) Joinder of Several Defendants in Plea. Two administrators may join in a plea of plene administraverunt, although their defenses under that plea are different.[94]

[b] Where a scire facias charges that a certain sum came into defendant's hands as assets, a plea denying that such sum came into his hands but not denying that a less sum, sufficient to pay plaintiff's judgment, came into his hands is bad. Rumbarger v. Stiver, 6 Oh. 99.

[c] A plea that defendants have fully administered all the goods and chattels, rights and credits of decedent which have come to their hands to be administered, "shall be intended to speak as to the time when the plea is filed," and although informal is good especially after verdict. Nixon v. Bullock, 9 Yerg. (Tenn.) 414, 416.

[d] A plea that the administrator had no assets to pay a judgment against him at the time of its rendition is insufficient in an action against him as administrator for failure to pay such judgment. The plea should either deny that there were assets at any time belonging to the estate or show that they had been applied to claims having a prior right to satisfaction. Cogan v. Duncan, 23 Miss. 274.

[e] Allegations of amount disputed or admitted.—Notwithstanding a statute which requires a defendant to make affidavit that his pleas are true and to state the amount of defendant's demand, if anything, admitted to be due or owing, and the amount disputed, the pleas of plene administravit, and that the claim has been paid supported by affidavit are sufficient. The statement of the amount due if anything and the amount disputed would add nothing to the meaning of an affidavit explicitly alleging the complete satisfaction of plaintiff's claim. Furthermore it is doubtful whether the statute has any application to executors who seldom have and are not supposed to have personal knowledge of testator's indebtedness. May v. plene administravit præter may be amended.[95] Defendant should be permitted to amend his plea by setting up plene administravit at any time before trial, if it appears that the plea is not made for delay.[96] In scire facias against administrators on a judgment against the intestate they should, after an agreement that the merits of the original judgment be tried without regard to the pleading, be allowed to amend by pleading plene administravit and no assets.[97]

[§ 2102] (g) Withdrawal of Plea. A plea of plene administravit cannot be withdrawn at the trial for the purpose of pleading ne unques executor.[98]

[§ 2103] (3) Statutes of Limitations—(a) Necessity of Pleading. The general rule, that one who desires to avail himself of the defense of the general statutes of limitation must plead them and show affirmatively that he comes within their provisions,[99] applies to executors and administrators,[1] unless, as is sometimes the case, the statute permits a personal representative to avail himself of the defense of limitations under a plea of the general issue.[2] Even under such statutes defendant may plead limitations specially if he elects to do so.[3] Unless it clearly appears from the complaint that the cause of action is barred by a special statute of limitations in favor of personal representatives,[4] such statutes must be specially pleaded to be availed of, in the absence of some statute dispensing with the necessity therefor,[5] and even where by virtue of statute a special plea is not necessary, if the representative prefers to present his defense by special plea instead of giving evidence under the general issue he will be held to the strictness of pleading.[6]

[§ 2104] (b) Requisites and Sufficiency of Plea. A plea of the general statute of limitations by a personal representative need not allege that decedent was a resident of the state for the statutory period prior to his death.[7] To make a special statute of limitations available as a defense the representative in his plea must set forth facts showing that he has complied with the provisions of the statute.[8] Thus, if the defense is that suit was not brought within the period required by statute, after grant of administration, the plea must show that notice of the grant of administration was given,[9] and in the manner required by statute,[10] unless the requirement in this regard is construed to be merely directory.[11] In alleging the giving of bond it will be sufficient for the plea to state that defendant gave bond to the judge of probate for the faithful administration of the estate according to law without setting out the bond.[12] It is not necessary for the plea to allege that defendant delivered the assets to the distributees or has taken refunding bonds.[13] In an action against a personal representative a plea of the statute of limitations should not notice the period which is in effect added to the period of limitation for bringing suits against personal representatives, the provision for such additional period not being intended to alter the form of pleading.[14] A plea "that the alleged cause of action did not accrue within three years of defendant's death" sufficiently shows that it must have accrued more than three years before the suit was brought.[15]

[b] The rule is different in a court of equity; the defense may then be made by plea, answer, or demurrer, and when it is interposed in the one mode or the other, if there are any special circumstances or any reason for excepting the case out of the statute it must be introduced by an amendment to the bill. [c] Statutes dispensing with necessity of pleading.—(1) The necessity of specially pleading statutes of limitations governing suits against personal representatives is dispensed with by statute allowing personal representatives to give in evidence under the general issue any special matter of defense. Sanders v. Robertson, 23 Miss. 389; Wren v. Span, 2 Miss. 115. (2) A statute of this character does not obviate the necessity of a special plea. The object of the statute is to give greater facilities to those sued in another's right and whom the law presumes not to be so conversant with the facts as the original actor in the transaction, and this reason can have no application in cases where the facts are peculiarly within the knowledge of the personal representative as must be the case when the defense is a failure of presentation of the claim to him within the required time. cedent's debts, a plea of the statute of limitations by the personal representative goes to the defense of both the personal and the real estate.[16]

[§ 2106] (4) Premature Commencement of Action. It is a good plea to an action against an executor that the action was commenced within the period during which he is by statute exempt from suit.[17] Such a plea has been held a plea in bar,[18] but it has also been regarded as a dilatory plea.[19] After a plea of the statute of limitations by an administrator, in an action against him for a debt of the estate it is too late to urge that the suit was prematurely brought, he never having refused to acknowledge the debts.[20]

[§ 2108] c. Replication—(1) To Plea of Limitations. An unanswered plea of the statute of limitations is a prima facie bar to a recovery.[25] If a personal representative sues or is sued in his individual capacity, a replication to a plea of the statute of limitations framed on the theory that he sues or is sued in his representative capacity is a departure and is fatally defective on demurrer,[26] and the same is true where the personal representative sues or is sued in his representative capacity, and the replication is framed on the theory that he sues or is sued in his individual capacity.[27] If plaintiff wishes to avoid the effect of a plea of the state of limitations by an executor or administrator by showing facts which take the case out of the operation of the statute, such, for instance, as nonadministration,[28] or delay at the request of the executor,[29] a special replication setting up such facts is necessary, and the same has been held to be necessary where plaintiff relies on the fact that by reason of the statutory exemption of the representative from suit for a designated period after death of decedent or qualification of the administrator the period fixed by the statute of limitations had not expired,[30] although this has been denied.[31] If to a declaration for money paid to defendant's use as executor he pleads statutory proceedings to bar creditors, a reply that the money was paid after the time limited for presentation for payment had expired is good without also alleging that assets remained in the executor's hands;[32] it devolves on him to allege want of assets.[33] Where a replication in an action against an administrator avers the pendency of a previous action against defendant's intestate at the time of the latter's death, that such action was brought before the statute of limitations had run, the appointment of commissioners after decedent's death and the presentation of the claim within one year after the death, it sufficiently denies the running of the statute of limitations.[34] To a plea of limitations by an executor of an estate represented insolvent it is not a sufficient answer to say that the estate is solvent and that after the lapse of the statutory period for bringing suit a further time was allowed by the judge of probate for creditors to exhibit and prove their claims, under which the demand in suit was duly proved.[35] A replication to a plea of the statute of nonclaim which shows that the demand was not presented within the statutory period is bad on demurrer.[36] Where a statute makes legacies or distributive shares not attached or paid to the person entitled thereto assets for the payment of a ratable proportion of the debts of a creditor who has not presented his claim within the time limited, a replication to a plea setting up his presentation of the claim in suit must allege that there has been a final settlement of the executors' accounts, for until that is done it cannot be determined whether there will be any surplus with which to pay legacies or distributive shares.[37] Variance in immaterial dates as stated in the declaration and in the replication is not such a departure as will sustain a general demurrer.[38]

[§ 2109] (2) To Plea of Plene Administravit.[39] It is a good replication to a plea of plene administravit that defendant has not fully administered the assets which came into his hands,[40] and it is not necessary that the replication should specify the assets unadministered.[41] It is not a good replication that decedent at the time of his death was seized of real estate which defendant if necessary could have reduced to assets for the payment of debts.[42] A replication to a plea of plene administravit which tenders an issue on publication is bad where the statute of nonclaim creates a complete bar on omission to exhibit a demand within the specified time whether the administrator dies or does not make publication as required by statute.[43] Where an administratrix sued as such alleges in a plea puis darrein continuance that she has fully administered, a replication which seeks a recovery on the faith of the assets received by her as "an administratrix de bonis non" after a new grant of administration without joining the coadministrator or coadministratrix de bonis non is bad as amounting to a departure.[44] If an administrator pleads fully administered except a certain sum and as to that sets forth judgments confessed by him giving the particulars of each, plaintiff cannot impeach them for fraud except on a special replication.[45] It has been held, however, that it is sufficient to allege fraud and covin generally without showing such fraud specifically.[46] Where, in an action against an executrix for attorney's fees for services rendered decedent, defendant pleaded a subsequent discharge as executrix and a settlement of the estate, and the replication alleged that the claim was duly filed in the probate court and presented to the executrix and subsequently sued on, at which time the executrix had sufficient assets to pay the indebtedness of the estate, including the claim sued on, and that the executrix, without declaring the estate insolvent and without paying the claim, procured an order finally discharging her as executrix, it was held that, as the replication was designed to defeat the pleas and to justify the further maintenance of the suit, it was permissible, and sufficient against a demurrer.[47]

[§ 2111] (4) To Other Pleas. Upon a scire facias issued to show cause why plaintiff should not have judgment to be levied de bonis propriis if an administrator pleads judgment and no assets ultra, replication thereto may be either nul tiel record, or assets ultra, or per fraudem, or any other fact properly triable by jury.[51] Where on a petition for a legacy against an administrator, he pleads that the will had been set aside by the probate court and distribution ordered among his heirs, a reply that the revocation by the court was void as being decreed without an issue to try the validity of the will and without notice and proof is good on demurrer.[52] Where in assumpsit against an executor defendant pleads that the testator devised land to plaintiff in satisfaction of his demand and that plaintiff accepted the devise, and plaintiff, protesting that testator did not make the devise in satisfaction of the demand and that the will was not proved, replies that he did not accept the land devised, the replication is good.[53] Where to an action against an estate defendant pleads a return of insolvency of the estate pending the action, which by statute is a good defense to all suits against the estate except for designated debts, a replication failing to show how much of the demand sued for is within the excepted class of debts is bad.[54]

that a rejoinder answering it is a departure from the plea because if the rejoinder does depart from the plea the fault lies with plaintiff.[55] Where an executor pleads in bar a devise in satisfaction of plaintiff's claims and a refusal by him to elect whether to take or refuse it and plaintiff replies a refusal to accept and traverses the refusal to elect, a rejoinder that the devise has not been waived is bad for departure.[56] A rejoinder alleging that defendant has assets but not more than sufficient to pay a judgment of a designated amount is not a departure in pleading from a plea of plene administravit præter alleging the unadministered assets to be of considerably less value than the sum designated in the rejoinder;[57] an averment of value is a mere matter of form and not traversable.[58] Where the replication to a plea of set-off sets up failure to file claims against the estate within the statutory time, a rejoinder that at the time the money which is sought to be recovered back was paid defendant's claims were not barred is insufficient, because failing to show that defendant was entitled to demand payment.[59]

[§ 2113] e. Demurrer. Where one sues as administrator, a demurrer to the complaint for want of sufficient facts raises the question of whether a cause of action exists in plaintiff as administrator.[60]

[§ 2114] f. Amendment. In actions by or against executors or administrators amendments to pleadings may be allowed in a proper case and upon the usual terms.[61] But as a temporary administrator has no authority to sue for recovery of land held adversely to the estate, his petition in such an action cannot be amended by substituting the name of one who sues as permanent administrator, and who was appointed as such after the commencement of the action, although the temporary administrator is the same person who was afterward made permanent administrator.[62]

[§ 2115] 2. Pleadings in Particular Classes of Actions—a. On Claims in Favor of Estate—(1) Declaration or Complaint. Where one sues in a representative capacity on a writing purporting to be executed to his decedent, the declaration or complaint must show decedent's death.[63] A count on an indebtedness to decedent with a promise to the representative is good without showing any promise to decedent,[64] and in assumpsit by an administrator de bonis non, the promise may be laid to have been made to the former administrator.[65] A defective allegation of a promise to the administrator, although a good ground for demurrer, cannot be taken advantage of after verdict.[66]

Action for deposit in bank. In an action by an executor for an amount deposited in bank by testator, an allegation that payment of the amount was demanded by means of an order requiring payment thereof, signed by the executor, which was "duly presented" to defendant for payment and payment refused, is sufficient to admit proof of a proper demand by plaintiff.[67]

Action for money had and received. A declaration alleging that money was received by defendant to the use of decedent in his lifetime and alleging a promise to decedent may be amended so as to allege that the money was received for the use of the administrator and the promise made to her.[68]

Action for rent. Where an administrator sues for rent under a statute, vesting him with authority to receive rents in the absence of heirs, a complaint for rent by the administrator alleging that he had authority to and did rent the property is a sufficient allegation of authority under the statute.[69]

Action for value of goods sold. A bill by an administrator to recover the value of certain personalty of decedent's estate sold by plaintiff to defendant was demurrable where it alleged that sale of the property was made at such price as could be agreed upon by arbitrators selected, but that before the arbitrators had acted the purchaser declared that he would not abide by their decision, and did not show that any price was agreed upon or that any inventory or appraisement of the property or any order of court for private sale thereof was made or that either party to the contract was uninformed as to the facts.[70]

[a] Illustrations.—(1) A defect in a plea to debt on a bond to which defendants' testator was a party, setting up failure to present the claim or to file the same in the office of the probate clerk within six months from the date of the first advertisement of the notice of the qualification of defendants as executors, and also that the action was not commenced within two years from the date of such notice, in failing to aver that the notice was published, is curable by amendment. Municipal Ct. v. Whaley, 26 R. I. 25, 57 A 1061. (2) In an action by an administrator de bonis non, where duly authenticated copies of his official bond and letters testamentary were filed with the clerk of the court, the proper practice being to incorporate copies of those documents in the petition itself, which was not done, he should be allowed to amend in this particular. Berkey v. Pueblo County, 48 Colo. 104, 110 P 197, 20 AnnCas 1109. (3) Where a demurrer is interposed to a declaration, in an action against an administrator, which alleges the presentation of the claim of the administrator for failing to allege that the claim was filed in the office of the clerk of the probate court as required by statute, the court may in its discretion permit an amendment to remedy the defect. Roberts v. White, 32 R. I. 185, 78 A 497, AnnCas1912D 793.

[b] Amendment not materially changing parties or cause of action.—There is not a material change of party or cause of action by the allegation of the original complaint that plaintiff was administrator by appointment of the United States court, being changed by the amended complaint to one that he was administrator by appointment of the tribal probate court. Scroggins v. Oliver, 7 Ind. T. 740, 104 SW 1161.

[c] Absence of discretion in refusing to allow amendment.—It is an abuse of discretion for the court, in an action to foreclose a mortgage, to refuse to permit an amendment of the complaint to be made at the trial by inserting a waiver of all recourse against the estate of the deceased mortgagor other than that described in the complaint. Anglo-Californian Bank v. Field, 146 Cal. 644, 80 P 1080.

[d] After impaneling of jury.—It was not error to permit plaintiff administratrix, after the jury had been impaneled, to amend by averring that her appointment was by a local court of a different county from that first alleged. work done by testator the executor in assumpsit therefor need not set out the contract specially.[71]

Action on bill or note. A declaration by an administrator, in an action on a note payable to his decedent, and past due at his death, need not aver a promise to the administrator.[72] In a suit on a note or other obligation in decedent's favor the declaration should show nonpayment both to decedent and his personal representative or representatives;[73] but it has been held that a general allegation that the note or obligation is due and unpaid is sufficient.[74] If an administrator acquires a note by assignment in the settlement of the estate and sues on it as administrator it is not necessary to allege that the note is an asset of the estate.[75] As an administrator may sue in his own name on a note payable to bearer, although transferred to his intestate during the lifetime of the latter, the complaint need not state the source of his title and if stated it need not be proved.[76] A complaint alleging that plaintiff as administrator had indorsed a note and was the legal holder of it and giving a description of the note states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.[77]

Action over against surety. Where an administratrix paid part of a debt for which intestate was liable as surety and after her marriage she and her husband pay the balance, she may as administratrix recover the whole of the debt from the principal in assumpsit for money paid by husband and wife as administrators without counting separately for the money paid by the administratrix before marriage.[78]

[§ 2116] (2) Plea or Answer. A plea in a suit by executors on a note given to them that the consideration was the sale of testator's title to land to which plaintiffs represented that testator had a right when in fact he had no title thereto is sufficient without an allegation that plaintiffs warranted title and that they knew that the title was not good.[79] In an action of debt by two executors on a note given to them a plea that defendant was appointed executor and qualified will not abate the suit.[80] A statute requiring verification of a plea denying execution of an instrument applies where the declaration alleges that plaintiffs were administrators of a designated person deceased at the time the promises were made and that the promises were made to them personally by that description.[81] Where an administrator sues as such on a note payable to him as administrator, it is a sufficient answer that the note is not the property of the estate but the individual property of the administrator.[82] To an action by an administrator for money in defendant's hands belonging to the estate, a plea that defendant's wards were entitled as distributees to a portion of the estate, without alleging that there were no debts, or what that interest amounted to, presents no defense.[83] In an action against a surviving husband by the administrator of his wife on a note executed by the husband, an allegation in the answer that at the wife's death the husband became entitled, as the surviving husband to her personal estate, is not a denial of the petition alleging the heirship of the wife,[84] and an allegation that neither decedent nor her estate was indebted to any person in any sum at the time of plaintiff's appointment and qualification as administrator, and that there was no occasion for his appointment and qualification, is not tantamount to a specific denial of a statement in the petition that plaintiff and his wife are creditors of the estate.[85]

Payment. To a suit by an executor on a claim due deceased, an answer that defendant had paid deceased the amount due and that it was paid in goods in satisfaction of the claim and so received by deceased is good as a plea either of payment or of accord and satisfaction.[86] To a suit by an administrator de bonis non a plea alleging, first, payment to the administrator who had afterward deposited it with defendant in his own name, and second, that such sum had been paid out on the orders of the administrator, is bad as setting up inconsistent defenses.[87]

Set-off. In an action by executors for an accounting on a contract, defendant, in pleading a set-off, is not required to allege affirmatively the facts showing that the demand is not affected fatally by any statute of limitations, or that the claim is valid or enforceable in the county court.[88] To entitle defendant to avail himself of an approved claim due him from the estate as an offset against the price of property sold him by the administrator, the answer must show that he is the only creditor entitled to the fund in which he seeks to apply the offset, or if other creditors are interested in the fund, it must state the extent and character of such other claims so that the court may determine whether such relief can be allowed.[89]

settled with a special administrator, a reply denying that a special administrator was appointed is sufficient to put in issue the validity of the alleged order appointing the special administrator.[91]

Averment of nonpayment. Where the action is on a written instrument for the payment of money, the declaration must allege nonpayment by decedent and also by personal representative.[98] If the complaint alleges presentation to, and rejection of, a claim by an administrator the specific allegation of nonpayment is unnecessary as this fact will be presumed from a rejection of the claim.[99]

Averment that representative "detains" or "owes." Although in charging an administrator as to a debt of his intestate it is usual to allege that he detains, or owes and detains, the money, the omission of the word "detains," and the use of the word "owes" only, does not vitiate a declaration charging defendant as administrator, and setting forth facts imposing liability in a representative capacity only.[1]

On promise of one of several executors. A count against an executor on the death of testator alleging a promise by one of the executors who was then the only executor who had qualified and that afterward letters were granted to the other executors whereby an action had accrued against both as executors is good.[2]

Averment of assets. In suits on claims against an estate it is not necessary to allege that there are assets in the hands of the representative;[3] but where the action is against the widow and the executor on a contract by which the widow promised to pay a certain amount and authorized the executor to pay such amount to plaintiff out of her share of the husband's estate, the complaint was demurrable, as to the executor, where it failed to allege that he had in his hands, when the agreement was made or at any time thereafter, money or property belonging to the widow.[4] A bill in equity to enforce a debt against a decedent's real estate, which discloses that he left personal assets, is insufficient, where by statute the personal assets are made primarily liable for debts.[5]

Variance between complaint and claim presented. In an action for services, a variance between the complaint and the claim presented to the representative with respect to the exact nature of the services may be disregarded where not prejudicial to defendant.[6] Where a claim presented to an administrator sought payment on one half the principal and interest due on certain notes, of which the claimant and deceased were joint makers, and a complaint, filed after the rejection of the claim counted on the same notes, made the same demand for payment, and further stated that plaintiff became the owner of the notes by virtue of a decree of distribution of the estate of the payee, the complaint sufficiently appeared to be based on the same

[a] Illustration.—A complaint in an action against an administrator, which alleges that there is due a specified sum on account made by decedent on a specified date, and that there is a specified sum due on an account stated between plaintiff and decedent on the same day, and which demands judgment for labor done for decedent and his wife during his lifetime at his request between designated dates, and which avers that the claim was verified and duly filed in the probate court, is sufficient as against the objection that the claim for money due by account fails to state for what the indebtedness was incurred, that it is indefinite as to whether the work was done for the administrator or decedent, and that it fails to show that the claim filed in the probate court was filed within twelve months after the granting of letters of administration. Gillespie v. Campbell, 149 Ala. 193, 43 S 28.

[b] Where the particulars of a claim lie rather within defendant's knowledge than plaintiff's, as where he has acknowledged in writing the receipt from decedent of "various claims" amounting to, etc., to be collected, in a suit on a receipt by the administrator, it is enough to set out the claims generally. demand as the claim to satisfy the requirements of the statute that a claim should be presented before being sued on.[7]

Miscellaneous averments. Where a statute provides that an executor or administrator, if the estate is insolvent, may institute suit before a probate court, and by giving notice compel the creditors to exhibit their claims, to be adjudged and paid pro rata, and that no suit shall afterward be brought against the executor or administrator, unless plaintiff alleges that such executor or administrator has been guilty of fraud, negligence, or waste, such allegation, in a subsequent suit, must be contained in plaintiff's declaration.[8] A count stating that decedent in his lifetime was indebted to plaintiff in a certain sum and made a writing ordering his executors to pay such sum to plaintiff one year after decedent's death does not state a cause of action against the executors, where it contains neither a statement of a promise to pay nor a statement of a delivery of the paper, which was testamentary.[9] The fact that a complaint on a rejected claim presented to an administrator segregates and lumps certain classes of items in the claim is no ground of objection where the complaint does not increase or diminish the amount of any item, or allege any different contract as to liability on any of the items than appeared on the face of the claim.[10]

[§ 2121] (b) Allegations as to Presentation, Verification, and Rejection of Claims—aa. Necessity. According to the weight of authority, where the statutes require presentation of a claim against an estate to the personal representative, the declaration or complaint in an action on such claim must allege presentation,[11] and it has been held that this rule applies as well in suits in equity as in actions at law.[12] In some jurisdictions, however, it is held that no allegation of the presentation of claims is necessary,[13] the view being taken that nonpresentation is a matter of defense.[14] If the statute requires rejection of the claim before suit brought it is necessary in an action on a claim to allege that it has been rejected.[15]

Authentication. It has been considered that one suing on a claim against an estate must allege not only the presentation and rejection of his claim, but also the proper authentication of the claim when presented.[16] But the more general view is that, although the statute requires verification or an affidavit of the justice of a claim as a condition to bringing suit thereon, it is not necessary that the petition in an action on the claim allege that a proper affidavit had been presented to the personal representative.[17]

[§ 2122] bb. Sufficiency. In alleging presentment an averment that notice of the claim was given in writing is not equivalent to an averment that the claim was presented in writing and is in-

It was merely alleged that said claim had been presented and rejected, and neither by any statement made in defendants in error's brief or pleading, nor in any other way, does it appear that the claim was accompanied by the affidavit prescribed by the statute. The notes were introduced in evidence, and while the record shows that certain indorsements were made upon them, yet it does not appear that either of said notes was accompanied by the affidavit prescribed in article 2070 of the statute, nor does it appear that either had indorsed thereon or annexed thereto a memorandum in writing signed by the administrator of Mrs. Pippin's estate showing its rejection by said administrator. It follows that, in the absence of allegations and proof that plaintiff in error's claim, based on the notes set out in his answer, was duly authenticated as prescribed by the statute, he failed to make out such a case as authorized a judgment in his favor. Judgment having been rendered against plaintiff in error as to the establishment of his claim, no presumption can be indulged that said claim, when presented to the administrator and by him rejected, if it was so presented and rejected, was properly verified").

sufficient,[18] and a declaration which alleges presentation, but not presentation in writing, is demurrable.[19] The complaint should state the facts constituting the presentation.[20] Where the complaint alleged that plaintiff duly presented her claim to defendant as administratrix, which claim contained a copy of such promissory note, and was duly verified by the oath of plaintiff in the form prescribed by law, it was held that if this averment was not sufficiently definite and certain the defect would not be fatal to a judgment for plaintiff, in the absence of demurrer or any averment in the answer that the claim was not supported by proper evidence.[21] If the statute requiring presentation is also a statute of nonclaim and bars the right of action if the claim is not presented within the prescribed time, the declaration, complaint, or bill should show that it was filed in the prescribed time,[22] or state grounds taking the claim out of the operation of the statute;[23] but it has been held that if the declaration or complaint alleges that the claim was properly presented failure to allege that it was filed in the prescribed time,[24] or a defective allegation in this regard[25] will not render the complaint bad on general demurrer. A declaration which alleges the presentation of the claim to the administrator but fails to allege that the claim was filed in the office of the clerk of the probate court as required by statute is demurrable.[26] If sufficient compliance with the statute as to the affidavit filed with the claim is shown by the complaint, it is immaterial that the affidavit attached to the complaint does not comply therewith.[27] Where plaintiff sues individually and as executor of another estate, an allegation that he presented to defendant, as administrator, a claim duly verified according to law amounts to an allegation that plaintiff presented such claim both individually and as executor.[28] As regards demand, it is enough for the petition to allege the claim had been proved and payment demanded,[29] and it has been held that demand and default need not be alleged, the presentation of the claim and its rejection being sufficient.[30]

[§ 2123] (c) Showing Set-Offs, Payments, and Credits. A petition alleging that no part of the notes sued on had been paid except the payments which appeared as credits on the notes, the date and amount of which had been previously set out, and that the notes remained due and unpaid, was not objectionable for failure sufficiently to allege that all legal offsets, payments, and credits had been allowed.[31] Where plaintiff's rejected claim against decedent's estate admitted a set-off in favor of decedent for several loans made on the security of real estate and contracts to purchase real estate, the complaint in an action on such claim was insufficient for uncertainty where it failed specifically to set out the loans made, and the property transferred and contracts assigned as security, with sufficient fullness to acquaint defendant administrator and the court therewith.[32]

[§ 2124] (d) Attaching Affidavit in Support of Claim. It is sometimes required that one suing a decedent's estate for personal services rendered decedent in his lifetime shall produce an affidavit that the claim is just and nothing has been paid thereon.[33] Where the complaint, in an action against an administrator on a note of intestate, alleges that a certain sum is the only payment which has been made on the note, and that a certain sum is due on it, after allowing all just credits, and the affidavit of plaintiff attached to the complaint states that "the facts set forth in the foregoing complaint are true," there is a substantial compliance with a statute providing that the claimant against a decedent's estate shall append to his demand an affidavit stating that nothing has been paid on it, except what is credited thereon, and that the sum demanded, which shall be named, is justly due.[34] In action against an administratrix to recover money collected by her and her deceased husband on plaintiff's notes, an affidavit authenticating the claim, setting out its amount, that nothing has been paid in satisfaction, and that a stated amount was justly due, was sufficient.[35]

[§ 2125] (e) Allegations of Breach of Contract. It is not necessary to allege a breach of a contract which only matures on the death of one of the parties, where the action is to recover from decedent's representative nothing more than what is expressly stipulated in the contract.[36]

[§ 2126] (f) Allegations of Solvency of Estate. A petition against an independent executor need not allege the solvency of the estate.[37]

[a] Declarations held sufficient.—(1) The allegation that plaintiff first presented to the executor his claim in writing and demanded payment thereof more than thirty days before the commencement of the action and within two years after notice given by the executor of his appointment is good. Dexter Sav. Bank v. Copeland, 72 Me. 220. (2) A complaint in an action against an administrator, which alleges that there is due a specified sum on an account made by decedent on a specified date, and that there is a specified sum due on an account stated between plaintiff and decedent on the same day, and which demands judgment for labor done for decedent and his wife during his lifetime at his request between designated dates, and which avers that the claim was verified and duly filed in the probate court, is sufficient as against the objection that the claim for money due by account fails to state for what the indebtedness was incurred, that it is indefinite as to whether the work was done for the administrator or decedent, and that it fails to show that the claim filed in the probate court was filed within twelve months after the granting of letters of administration. tor has rejected the claim, and that the notes will not mature for several years, states a cause of action in equity, entitling claimant to have the notes declared valid.[38]

[§ 2128] bb. Actions Based on Fraud. Where the gist of an action against an administrator is a fraud perpetrated by his intestate, the fraud must be alleged and proved.[39]

[§ 2129] cc. Claims for Money Lent. In an action by one who had loaned money to executors to pay a note renewing one executed by decedent, praying that the land be sold to pay the judgment, and alleging that the money was loaned at request of legatees, where there was no allegation that the debts had been paid or the estate was insolvent, or setting forth how such agreement could bind any creditors, the petition did not state a cause of action.[40]

[§ 2130] dd. Claims for Money Paid. In assumpsit against an executor for money paid by a cosurety of the testator after his death the declaration should set forth the facts specially.[41] A count for money paid out and expended for the use of a person designated as administrator of another, deceased, is bad because the administrator is personally liable and the declaration should be so drawn.[42]

[§ 2132] ff. Claims for Services. In a petition to establish a rejected claim for services rendered an estate under contract the claimant must allege the contract, rendition of the services, and that they were for the benefit of the estate, and that the price charged was reasonable.[44] Where the action is by one who stood in a family relation to decedent so as to raise a presumption that the services were gratuitous,[45] the complaint must allege a promise on the part of decedent to pay therefor or facts from which such a promise would be implied.[46] In an action against executors to recover commissions on the sale of lands under a contract made with them an allegation that defendants are executors, independent of the control of the county court, and that there is no restriction in the contract as to the sale of the lands "save that it was requested by defendants that they should be sold as soon as practicable for cash, as provided by the will of defendants' testator, at a fair price," is sufficient on general demurrer as to the power of the executors to make the contract.[47] The complaint in an action against an executor for services rendered decedent and his wife states a cause of action where it alleges that the services were rendered under an agreement with decedent, plaintiff's father, that after she became twenty-one years of age she should keep house and care for her parents, and, in consideration thereof, her father would devise the homestead in fee to her; that he executed such a will, which plaintiff saw, and which induced her to remain at home and care for her parents for more than twelve years, but that shortly before his death her father, decedent, destroyed such will and executed another, which did not devise the property to plaintiff, leaving his estate indebted to her in the sum named.[48] In an action against an executor for personal services rendered to decedent, allegations as to the amount of decedent's estate are immaterial, and should be stricken out on motion.[49] Where the petition in an action against an administrator seeking a personal judgment on account of care and support furnished to decedent for a number of years set forth an agreement under which such care and support were to be furnished during the remainder of her life in consideration of a house and lot being conveyed to plaintiffs, and that decedent died the owner of such house and lot and intestate, the action was for a quantum meruit and the references in the petition to the agreement or the contract were surplusage.[50]

Amendment. One suing on a claim against an estate for services rendered may amend his complaint so as to increase the amount sought to be recovered to an amount greater than the claim presented without changing the claim from that originally presented.[51]

[§ 2135] ii. Claims for Funeral Expenses. A complaint in an action for funeral expenses of the decedent must allege that the amount sought to be recovered is a reasonable amount in view of all the circumstances.[55]

"In order to state a cause of action in such a case, the complaint must contain proper allegations designed to show that the amount sought to be recovered is a reasonable and proper charge against the estate in view of all the circumstances, so far as they could with reasonable diligence be ascertained at the time of the burial. (Woerner on Administration, 2d ed. sec 359.) The complaint before us contains no such allegations. All that is alleged is that the plaintiff rendered services and supplied materials for the funeral and burial of the body and 'that the reasonable value of such services and merchandise was and is the sum of $1110.' This means no more than it says,—namely, that the services and merchandise furnished were worth the amount named. It may well be that they were fairly worth $1110, but that at the same time a charge of $1110 would be greatly excessive for the estate upon which the burden of this payment is sought to be imposed. The plaintiff is not seeking to recover upon a contract made by the decedent, but is endeavoring to charge against the estate the

Plaintiff may, for the purpose of avoiding the statute of limitations, plead a promise of the representative to pay, in consideration of the existence of the indebtedness, and it is not necessary to allege that such promise was made in consideration of assets.[56]

[§ 2137] (2) Plea or Answer—(a) In General. Non est factum is a good plea in an action against an executor or administrator on an obligation of deceased.[57] In an action on a promise of decedent a plea of not guilty by his representative is insufficient;[58] and a plea of outstanding judgments recovered against decedent jointly with other persons must allege that decedent was the survivor.[59] Where a claim is not presented to the commissioners of an insolvent estate in accordance with a statute prohibiting suit thereon, unless the claim has been so presented, objection for nonpresentation may be taken by plea in bar, or by a brief statement, and need not be taken by a plea in abatement.[60] In an action against an administrator on a nonnegotiable written instrument under seal, payment of which was to be made by the administrator after the maker's death, a plea alleging that the instrument was executed by the maker for fraudulent purposes, and the payee and administrator knew of the fraudulent intention when the writing was executed, is good.[61] It has been held that in an action against an executor a plea based upon the want of an affidavit verifying the existence of the debt claimed is not good.[62] If the laws of a state give a preference to its citizens in the payment of the debts of the deceased, the representative if sued by a foreign creditor should plead such preference,[63] and if he wishes to avail himself of a statutory provision that suit to establish a money demand against the estate must be brought in the county where the estate is being administered he must in order to assert his privilege state in what county the estate is being administered.[64] The statutes sometimes make it unnecessary for defendant to plead any matter by way of answer, except a set-off or counterclaim.[65] Where in an action against an administrator on a former judgment against decedent the complaint did not allege and it did not appear that intestate had any real estate, a demurrer to the answer on the ground that it did not state what disposition if any had been made of the real estate is insufficient,[66] and where in such action the answer states the date and terms of the sale of decedent's property by the administrator and alleges that the purchase money was paid when due, it is not demurrable for failure to state at what time the money was received.[67]

[§ 2138] (b) Allegations as to Failure to Give Notice of or Present Claim. The objection that plaintiff has failed to comply with the statutory requirement as to notice or presentment of his claim to the personal representative as a prerequisite to bringing suit thereon cannot be taken by plea in abatement but only by plea in bar, as a compliance with the statute is essential to the right of recovery.[68] Under statute, it has been held that evidence of noncompliance with the statutory requirement may be given either under a special plea or a brief statement under the general issue;[69] and, independent of any statutory provisions to that effect, it has been held that, where the general issue is pleaded, plaintiff must in order to entitle himself to a verdict prove that he has exhibited his demand to the personal representative before bringing suit.[70]

[§ 2139] (c) Payment or Settlement. In an action against an administrator for board and cash furnished decedent, a plea of payment is insufficient where it avers that defendant cannot allege when and to whom payment was made for want of sufficient information, except that decedent habitually paid his board monthly and was prompt to pay what he owed at maturity.[71] A plea alleging that the administrator settled the claim sued on is not bad for failing to allege that he received a reasonable amount in satisfaction of the claim and that the settlement was authorized by the court.[72]

[§ 2140] (d) Set-Off. If, in defense to an action ex contractu, brought against an administrator, he desires to plead by way of set-off that rent on land belonging to the estate he represented was illegally collected by plaintiff, he must allege facts from which the law will imply an obligation on amount of an expenditure incurred on behalf of the estate. The complaint shows that some expenditure was necessary and proper. It does not show what amount was necessary or proper and for that reason justly chargeable against the estate. For these reasons we think the demurrer should have been sustained, with leave to plaintiff to amend its complaint." Golden Gate Undertaking Co. v. [a] Verification. — (1) Where the complaint is founded on an instrument alleged to have been executed by decedent, the administrator need not deny decedent's signature on oath. Heath v. Lent, 1 Cal. 410; Knight v. Knight, 9 Fla. 283; Hicks v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co., 166 Iowa 532, 147 NW 883, LRA1915A 872. Contra Vincent v. Pitman, 1 Mo. 712. (2) But where a statute provides that one sued as maker of a note signed in his name by agent cannot deny the agency, except by plea verified by oath, an administrator denying that an agent had authority to sign his intestate's name to a note must do so on oath. Ellis v. Planters' Bank, 8 Miss. 235.

[b] A rule of court that the execution of the note may be taken as admitted at the trial unless defendant or someone in his behalf shall deny its execution on oath does not apply to executors and administrators, because in no ordinary case would it be possible for a personal representative to set out on oath in specific detail the nature and incidents of a transaction to which his decedent had been a party and to which he was a stranger. [a] Sufficient pleas illustrated. — (1) Where, in a suit against executors upon a claim against decedent, plaintiff alleges in his complaint that on Dec. 9, 1881, his claim duly verified was duly presented to defendants as executors, for allowance, and defendants "deny that on the ninth day of December, at said city and county, or elsewhere, the claim of plaintiff for the sum of thirty six thousand dollars . . . or the claim as in plaintiff's complaint set forth, or the claim upon which this action is founded, or any claim whatever, was duly presented to these defendants for allowance," the denial, although open to criticism, is sufficient to raise an issue. Rowland v. Madden, 72 Cal. 17, 20, 12 P 226, 870. (2) Where the complaint alleges that the claim duly verified had been presented, presentation is sufficiently denied by an affirmative allegation in the answer that the claim was not presented or verified as required by answer. the part of plaintiff to account for the money so collected as money had and received by him to defendant's use.[73]

[§ 2141] (e) Right to Delay Answer. A statutory right of an executor or administrator to delay answer "until the estate in his hands is sufficiently administered to enable him to answer the same" must be asserted by proper plea or motion, and it is not incumbent on plaintiff to show the condition of the estate in his hands.[74]

[§ 2142] (3) Affidavit of Defense. In an action on a contract made by decedent, his personal representative is not required to file an affidavit of defense as to matters arising before decedent's death.[75] An executor will not be required to file an additional affidavit of defense, where plaintiff is permitted to amend his statement in an action on several notes by alleging that all the notes were received before maturity instead of alleging that all the notes except one were received before maturity.[76]

[§ 2144] c. To Set Aside Fraudulent Conveyances. In a suit by a personal representative to set aside a fraudulent conveyance of decedent the bill must state a case clearly within the statute under which he claims his authority to sue.[78] It must show that suit is brought within the period fixed by statute for instituting suits of this character,[79] and that the suit is brought on behalf of creditors;[80] and if the statute requires a request from creditors to bring the suit, the bill must also allege such request.[81] The petition must state substantially the same facts as the decedent's creditors would have been required to allege if they had sued to set aside the conveyance,[82] and must of course show that the conveyance was in fraud of creditors.[83] It should also show that there is a deficiency of assets to pay claims against the estate [84] or that the estate is insolvent;[85] and if the statute requires a suggestion of insolvency this also must be alleged.[86] The names of the creditors defrauded by the conveyance need not be alleged.[87]

Pleas and answers. It is not a sufficient answer to a suit of this character that other property conveyed by decedent is equally liable with that conveyed to defendant.[88]

[§ 2145] d. To Set Aside Gifts. Where an administrator sues in behalf of creditors to recover a gift made by his intestate in contemplation of death, it sufficiently appears that there are creditors interested in having the property recovered where it is alleged that there are outstanding and unpaid claims, which have been duly presented, allowed by the administrator, and approved by the county judge, and that there is no property other than that in possession of defendants out of which they can be satisfied.[89]

[§ 2146] e. To Avoid Sales or Transfers for Fraud on Decedent. In an action by an administrator to avoid a sale for fraud practiced by the buyer on the intestate, an allegation that the intestate was induced to make the sale in fraud of his creditors does not make the action one by the administrator as trustee for the creditors.[90] A complaint by a special administrator, alleging that defendants by fraud and undue influence secured the execution of a contract by the parents of one of them, whereby they transferred to them all their property, on the pretended consideration of defendants' promise to support them, and praying cancellation thereof and an accounting, does not state a cause of action under a statute affording creditors of a decedent the means of following property fraudulently transferred by decedent, and hence the requirements of such statute are inapplicable.[91]

[a] Fraudulent intent will not be inferred (1) from facts set out in the complaint that the conveyance was voluntary and that intestate was insolvent. Threlkel v. Scott, 89 Cal. 351, 26 P 879. (2) A general allegation that decedent delivered the deed in escrow for the purpose of distributing the property among his heirs without will or administration and reserving the power to destroy the instruments is not sufficient to show fraud. Crittenden v. Basom, 46 Mich. 33, 8 NW 573.

[b] Amendments.—Where an administrator sues to set aside certain conveyances by his intestate on the ground that they were procured by fraud, he may at the trial be allowed to amend his bill and claim relief on the ground of the insolvency of the estate and that consequently the conveyances were fraudulent as to creditors. [a] Allegation sufficient to show deficiency.—(1) A complaint is sufficient where it alleges that claims allowed against the estate amount to five hundred dollars and claims pending for two hundred and fifty dollars more and that the personal estate is only fourteen dollars without further alleging that the claims are valid. Radabaugh v. Silvers, 135 Ind. 605, 35 NE 694. (2) A complaint alleging a deficiency of assets to meet the payment of claims is sufficient, at least in the absence of a special demurrer, without alleging that all the property so fraudulently conveyed was needed to pay the debts and that between the time of the conveyance and the institution of the suit the debtor remained without sufficient property to satisfy the creditors. Ackerman v. Merle, 137 Cal. 157, 69 P 982.

[b] Failure to show formal presentation or allowance of claims.—Where the grantor's administrator set out, in an action to reform a deed, that claims were asserted against the estate, and that its assets were insufficient to meet them, the petition was not demurrable because it showed that the demands had not been allowed or formally exhibited. 92. Sturgeon v. Underwood, 2 SW 655, 8 KyL 606; Martin v. Spurrier, 23 Oh. Cir. Ct. 110.

[a] Complaint held sufficient.—In an action for possession of real estate brought by the executors of a will it is sufficient to allege that they have a legal estate in the premises, and are entitled to the immediate possession thereof, and that defendant unlawfully keeps them out of possession. Martin v. Spurrier, 23 Oh. Cir. Ct. 110.

in his bill in order that defendant may be put on notice as to the facts on which his property is sought to be condemned.[93]

[§ 2148] g. To Quiet Title. Under the statute passing to the personal representative of a decedent the right of possession of his real estate for the purpose of administration, an allegation in an action by an administrator to quiet title that defendants claim adversely to the heirs of his intestate is equivalent to an allegation of a claim adverse to the administrator and is a sufficient pleading of such adverse claim, although there is no direct allegation of a claim adverse to plaintiff as administrator.[94]

[§ 2149] h. To Foreclose Mortgages. On a bill by an executor to foreclose a mortgage, it must be alleged that the mortgage is part of the estate of decedent.[95] It is not necessary to allege that plaintiff is the owner and holder of the mortgage, but it is sufficient that it is in his possession as executor and is on its face made to decedent.[96] If it is sought to foreclose a mortgage given by an executor on testator's property, an allegation that "the will authorized and directed said executor to administer upon said estate without the intervention, order, or advice of any court and to fully execute all its terms and provisions" sufficiently shows that its terms dispense with letters of administration;[97] and his power to make the mortgage is shown where it appears from the complaint that it was decedent's intent that the estate should be administered without the aid of any court, that the executor had performed all the terms and conditions of the will, had executed the note and mortgage, and that his action therein had been fully confirmed by the court.[98] If one suing as executrix to recover the surplus proceeds of a foreclosure sale of property of the estate is without power to maintain such suit, this fact is apparent on the face of the complaint and must be taken advantage of by demurrer or the objection is waived.[99]

Pleas and answers. In proceedings to foreclose a mortgage, or in any action asserting a charge on the land, commenced in the courts of the Indian Territory before statehood, the plea of the statute of nonclaim was not available, nor was any affidavit of nonpayment or justness necessary.[1]

[§ 2150] i. To Foreclose Mechanics' Liens. Where the complaint in mechanic's lien proceedings against the administrator of the owner of the premises seeks to recover on a contract with the owner in his lifetime for the performance of work and labor upon, and the furnishing of material for, a building, and to enforce a mechanic's lien, a plea, averring a decree of the probate court declaring the estate to be insolvent after suit was brought, although not an answer to the part of the complaint seeking a lien and not a bar to the part seeking a judgment against the personal property of decedent which might come into the hands of the administrator, is something more than mere suggestion, and should be permitted to remain on the files as a plea to protect the administrator.[2]

[§ 2153] l. Based on Misfeasance or Malfeasance of Representative. A declaration in debt for a devastavit should allege that goods and chattels sufficient to pay the debt came to the hands of the representative to be administered,[9] and the charges of waste, etc., must be specific;[10] general charges are insufficient.[11] In a complaint against an executor for neglecting to inventory and sell certain property, it must be expressly averred that the property has come to his knowledge.[12] If a distributee seeks to charge an administrator after final settlement for waste, the petition must allege that there are no creditors and that the property alleged to have been wasted was not applicable to the payment of debts.[13] A complaint, in an action by heirs against the administrator for loss of lands through defendant's failure to pay taxes, or redeem, is demurrable where there is no allegation of negligence and an unassailed discharge of the administrator.[14] Where the complaint charges that a coexecutor who had been removed purchased stock sued for in his own name with the funds of the estate which he pledged for his own debt, and alleges that such executor and his wife transferred their interest in the stock of plaintiff, the complaint should also allege the date of such transfer.[15] The complaint of the administrator of a life tenant under a will to recover rents and profits belonging to her, but converted to his own use by one named in the will as executor but who did not qualify as such, need not allege that the estate of testator had been settled and his debts paid.[16] Where an administrator sells land of the estate subject to a mortgage, but fails to take a bond from the purchaser to pay the mortgage as he is required by statute to do, a complaint by the widow against him for damages for neglect to take a bond does not state a cause of action if it fails to allege that the whole property was worth more than the amount of the mortgage.[17] In an action to subject an executor to a penalty for failure to file the will within the time prescribed by statute the declaration need not allege that the omission was intentional,[18] but it must be alleged in the language of the statute that the neglect was without "just excuse made and accepted by the judge of probate for such delay."[19] In an action by an administrator de bonis non to recover property alleged to have been illegally sold by his predecessor or, if the sale is valid, to foreclose the statutory mortgage for the price, the bill must allege the amount of money to be recovered or an excuse must be given for not doing so.[20] A bill against an administrator for not collecting accounts alleged to have been solvent at the time he received them cannot be so amended as to include a claim for the balance of the year's support, which had been set aside for testator's children, especially as it had been allowed and approved by the ordinary of the county for that amount.[21]

10. Davis v. Yerby, Sm. & M. Ch. (Miss.) 508.

[a] Allegation sufficient to show devastavit.—A bill against an administrator averring that he received money arising from a sale of decedent's property, which he did not appropriate to any legal purpose, and that the complainants, who were judgment creditors, made frequent demands on him to pay their claims which he refused after the return nulla bona of executions issued on their judgments sufficiently alleges a devastavit without further averring that the assets of the estate were misapplied and wasted by the administrator. Whitfield v. Evans, 56 Miss. 488.

11. Davis v. Yerby, Sm. & M. Ch. (Miss.) 508.

Pleas and answers. In an action against an executor suggesting a devastavit the plea of nil debet is good as well as that of not guilty.[22] In trespass quare clausum by the widow against the administrator a plea of justification "that he entered to remove the goods of the intestate" must allege that the goods of intestate were on the premises.[23] In an action to recover property bequeathed to plaintiff and alleged to be unlawfully detained by the executor the answer may properly set up facts showing an excuse for the detention of the property.[24] In an action by heirs to recover land illegally purchased by the representative at a sale thereof to pay debts, he cannot without pleading it avail himself of the defense that the heirs were estopped by their conduct from attacking the validity of the purchase.[25]

[§ 2154] m. Based on Conversion of or Injuries to Personal Property.[26] If a personal representative brings an action based on the conversion of personal property belonging to the estate the declaration or complaint must describe the property.[27] An allegation that defendant "took and carried away certain chattels of the plaintiff's intestate" sufficiently alleges property in the intestate,[28] and an allegation that the estate owned and possessed the property is equivalent to an allegation that the administrator owned and possessed it.[29] The alternative averment that the property was received "by the decedent or by the defendants for his use" is good.[30] A complaint in an action by an administrator against decedent's sole heir, charging defendant with the sale of real estate belonging to decedent, and that a certain sum is due from defendant to complainant on account of moneys "and other personal property" wrongfully converted by defendant, does not by the use of the words quoted sufficiently allege that decedent owned any personal property at the time of his death.[31] A complaint alleging that decedent held in trust for plaintiff certain securities which he bequeathed by his will and that his executors had converted them and although requested have refused to account to plaintiff for them, states a good cause of action against the executors.[32] A bill for the recovery of bonds deposited to secure the performance by the pledgor of a contract with the pledgee cannot be maintained against the administrator of the pledgee, where it is not alleged that the bonds had ever come into the administrator's possession.[33] A petition in replevin, which describes defendant as executrix, which alleges the death of decedent, the granting of letters testamentary to defendant, and her qualifying as executrix and acting as such, and which alleges plaintiff's ownership of the property in controversy, and defendant's refusal to surrender it on demand, when considered in connection with a summons directed against defendant as executrix, states a cause of action against defendant as executrix, and not individually.[34] A complaint in action in claim and delivery, or replevin, against an administrator both personally and in his representative capacity, which charged that defendant, having obtained the property from plaintiff by false represen-

[a] Insufficient description. — In an action by an administrator to recover goods belonging to the estate the allegation of the complaint, "bonds to the amount of $2,100, issued by the county of Wilson, State of Tennessee, and known as Wilson county bonds," is not a sufficient description of the bonds. tations, thereafter caused it to be inventoried and appraised as the property of the estate, etc., did not state a cause of action against defendant as an individual.[35] One suing executors individually and in their representative capacity for conversion and alleging demand on both deceased and his executors must allege the date of each demand.[36] In trespass for an injury to personal property, the declaration should allege that the property belonged to plaintiff as administrator.[37]

Seeking double damages. An administrator, proceeding under a statute providing that a person converting to his own use property of a decedent shall be liable to the administrator in double the amount of damages, should allege that he seeks to recover double damages, or the action will be treated as one for the actual damages sustained under a statute making a person converting to his own use property of a decedent liable to the administrator for the value thereof and injury caused thereby.[38]

Pleas and answers. An answer in an action by the representative to recover certain property, denying decedent's title to it and asserting a lien should specifically state the nature of the lien,[39] and in an action by an administrator for the conversion of a certain sum of money left by decedent an answer that defendant loaned decedent the identical money described, that decedent's widow took possession of it on his death and told defendant that she would take out letters of administration and requested him to take back the money and deliver to her a note decedent had given therefor, which he did, is insufficient.[40] Where the complaint for a conversion by executors of property received by them from the estate of their testator, but owned by a third person, seeks to charge them both as individuals and as executors, they may set up in their answer any matter which would constitute a defense in either aspect of the case.[41]

Pleas and answers. An executor sued in covenant may under a general plea to the merits, such as covenant performed, give any special matter in evidence, where a statute provides that executors may give any special matter in evidence under the general issue.[46]

[§ 2156] o. For Legacies or Distributive Shares. The complaint in an action for a legacy must show that plaintiff is entitled thereto under the terms of the will.[47] One who sues for a legacy or distributive share need not negative the existence of matters of defense;[48] nor is it necessary to allege that plaintiff had demanded his legacy where it is alleged that the executors have refused to pay it.[49] It has also been held unnecessary to allege that a refunding bond was executed and tendered before suit.[50] The declaration or bill should, however, allege that a surplus sufficient to satisfy the legacy or distributitve share remains or will remain after payment of debts of the estate,[51] or that the unpaid claims are barred,[52] especially where the estate has been declared insolvent.[53] If under the will title to a legacy does not pass to the legatee until the executor has assented thereto his assent or refusal must be alleged, although the estate owes no debts.[54] If suit is brought on a decree of the probate court to recover a legacy, it is not necessary to allege that the executor has it in his possession.[55] If suit is brought by an heir to recover a legacy to the ancestor death of the ancestor must be alleged,[56] and a bill against the administrator of complainant's father to recover the distributive shares of their brothers, alleged to have died during minority, is demurrable where no reason is shown why there was no administration on their estates.[57] The complaint in an action by the legatee against the administrator and a creditor of the estate in which

[b] Complaint not insufficient for failure to allege existence of assets.—The complaint in an action for a legacy brought by the legatee against the executor which alleges that the executor refused to allow or disallow the legacy as a claim, and that within the time allowed by law, the clerk of the court entered the claim on the court docket for trial, is not insufficient for failing to allege the existence of assets to pay the legacy. a fraudulent payment of the creditor's claim is alleged need not set forth the will under which the legacy is claimed.[58] In an action by a guardian to recover a legacy bequeathed to his ward, the complaint need not allege that the legacy had been paid into the surrogate's court.[59]

Pleas and answers. Where the action is to recover a balance alleged to be due on a legacy, an answer setting up that such balance has been paid as a collateral inheritance tax by order of court is not objectionable for failure to state the order to have been duly made.[60] In such action an answer denying that any demand has been made for such balance raises an issue which must be tried under a statutory requirement that if after a certain time a personal representative refuses on demand to pay over a legacy an action may be maintained therefor.[61] Where, in a suit against an executrix for plaintiff's distributive share, the complaint charged that the decree distributed to plaintiff a certain amount in discharge of a legacy bequeathed to plaintiff to endow a bed in plaintiff's hospital to the memory of testatrix's husband, an allegation in the answer that the decree directed that the legacy is used for the endowment of a bed for the poor, in memory of testatrix's husband, and that plaintiff should take the legacy subject to that condition, raised no material issue.[62] In a proceeding to recover a legacy an answer by the executor stating that no assets have come to hand, that none could be acquired by defendant, and that all the general personalty left by testator was consumed by his family for their support before defendant qualified, is insufficient as a plea in bar of an accounting.[63]

[§ 2158] q. Between Personal Representatives. In a suit by one administrator against his coadministrator for the recovery of money alleged to be due complainant from intestate for services rendered and merchandise supplied, the bill should give defendant full information so as to apprise him of the time when and the nature of the labor performed, and the kind and extent of the merchandise delivered and when delivered, such matters being peculiarly within complainant's knowledge and of which defendant is presumptively ignorant.[67]

[§ 2159] r. By Administrator De Bonis Non against Predecessor. A petition by an administrator de bonis non in an action against his predecessor for property not accounted for which alleges the value of the estate which came into defendant's hands as shown by the inventory is sufficient without setting up the entire inventory of the estate, where the amount paid over to creditors by defendant and the value of the assets turned over to plaintiff are both alleged and from these a balance appears not to have been accounted for.[68] If the basis of the suit is a devastavit in failing to redeem stock belonging to the estate which had been sold under a decree subject to redemption within a designated time, it must be alleged that there were assets in defendant's hands available and applicable for the purpose of redemption and that the proper court order the redemption to be made.[69] If an administrator is appointed to administer on assets left unadministered on the death of the executor and brings suit against an executor of the former executor, the complaint need not allege that assets ever came into defendant's hands.[70] In an action by an administrator de bonis non against his predecessor for an alleged conversion of money belonging to the estate defendant cannot show under the general issue payment and expenditures for the estate, as such matter is in confession an avoidance.[71]

had at all times been minors, without guardians, prior to the bringing of the suit, had settled their ancestor's interest in the partnership without administration, the complaint was not demurrable on the ground that they might have done so.[76] The complaint, in an action to foreclose a lien on certificates of stock, alleging that plaintiff is the holder of one certificate under a pledge from the deceased owner to secure a debt and the holder of the other certificate, together with the indebtedness it secured by assignment from a third person to whom it had been assigned by decedent to secure the indebtedness, that after the owner pledged the first certificate to plaintiff he assigned his interest to defendant subject to the indebtedness secured, and that the title to the second certificate assigned to the third person, subject to the indebtedness, was owned by decedent at his death, states a cause of action against the administratrix of the deceased owner as against a demurrer.[77] Where a statute imposes a lien in favor of the administrator of a solvent estate upon the share of an heir indebted to the intestate at his death, and makes it enforceable by suit and attachment by the administrator within two years after administration granted, the lien to have priority to any other attachment of the share, it is not necessary in enforcing the lien by suit and attachment to allege in the declaration that the estate is solvent if the right of action is not based on the statute, but is independent of it.[78]

[§ 2163] 2. What Must Be Proved. An executor or administrator suing in his representative capacity need not prove his appointment where this is admitted by the answer,[96] or even, it has been held, where there is no plea challenging his right to sue.[97] Where an administrator files a plea of the statute of nonclaim, and plaintiff takes issue thereon, plaintiff in order to recover must prove the time of the granting of letters of administration and that the claim was filed within the statutory time thereafter.[98] Where the answer of an administrator admits the presentation and rejection of plaintiff's claim, evidence thereof is not required,[99] it being sufficient for plaintiff to show that the action is founded on the claim which was presented for allowance.[1] Neither is it necessary for plaintiff to prove nonpayment of his claim, where the representative had appeared and contested to claim but did not set up the payment in his answer.[2] Under a statute providing that, when any claim is transferred for trial, it shall not be necessary for the executor or administrator to plead any matter by way of answer except a set-off or counterclaim, to which plaintiff shall reply, etc., a verified plea of non est factum in an action on a note against an administrator of one of the parties was not necessary to impose on plaintiff the burden of proving the execution of the instrument sued on and the assignment thereof.[3] In an action by an administrator for the conversion of property belonging to his decedent, failure to prove an allegation that decedent left a will is not fatal, since plaintiff does not derive his title from the will.[4] Where a rule of court provides that the execution of a note shall be taken as admitted, unless defendant or some one in his behalf shall by affidavit of defense deny its execution, and another rule requires executors and administrators to file affidavits of defense, proof of the execution of a note in an action against an executor will not be required, if no affidavit of defense has been filed denying the execution of the note.[5]

[§ 2165] b. Denial of Representative Capacity. A plea of ne unques administrator is a denial only that plaintiff was administrator at the commencement of the suit, and defendant cannot under this plea show the termination of plaintiff's authority as administrator pending the suit.[8] Under this plea questions whether the court granted the letters to the right or the wrong person or acted irregularly in revoking letters issued to defendant and granting letters to plaintiff cannot be considered.[9]

[§ 2166] c. Plea of Plene Administravit. Under a plea of plene administravit defendant may show payment of preferred debts, funeral expenses, and expenses of administration,[10] and may give in evidence the record of a judgment confessed by him.[11] He may also give in evidence a debt due himself,[12] or show that the estate has been settled and distributed in accordance with proceedings under a commission in insolvency.[13] Returns of administrators of legatees who were deceased at the time of the trial charging themselves with sums received from the executors are admissible.[14] Defendant cannot show under such plea a receipt for payment of money, which payment had been disallowed by the probate court.[15] He cannot give in evidence outstanding judgments,[16] or the existence of debts of a superior dignity[17] or a deed of trust to prove that certain property is not to be considered as assets;[18] and in an action by a legatee against an executor the executor cannot give in evidence proof that he had equally or proportionately distributed the residue of the personal estate after payment of debts among his several legatees.[19] Under this plea plaintiff may show assets not included in the inventory or, where there is no inventory returned, may show assets in the hands of the administrator.[20] In a suit against the sureties on the bond of an administrator, where defendant is a legal representative of one of the sureties on the bond, a plea of plene administravit may be met by the introduction of evidence disclosing that defendant's testator left property which was subject to plaintiff's demand, and which ought to be in defendant's hands for administration.[21] Under a replication to a plea of plene administravit that assets have and ought to have come to the administrator's hands plaintiff is entitled to prove a devastavit.[22]

[§ 2167] d. Actions on Claims in Favor of Estate. In a suit by a personal representative as such he must allege a promise made to decedent in his lifetime to admit proof of that fact,[23] and in an action by an executor to recover money alleged to have been paid by testatrix in her lifetime evidence of payment made by himself after her death is inadmissible.[24] In the absence of a statute providing otherwise, an administrator relying on a new promise to avoid the plea of limitations must insert in the declaration a count on the promise made to himself or to his intestate as the case may be.[25] If an administrator is substituted as plaintiff in an action commenced by his intestate and defendant pleads a set-off of moneys due from plaintiff, evidence of an indebtedness of intestate to defendant is admissible.[26]

Under general issue. A release given by a former administrator of plaintiff's intestate, who was authorized to make it may properly be introduced under the general issue, in an action by an administrator to recover for causing the death of his intestate.[27]

Under plea of payment. A plea of payment to the representative will not warrant the introduction of evidence of payment to decedent,[28] and in debt on a judgment by executors defendants cannot prove under the plea of payment that testator had renounced his interest in certain of defendants' lands and that his devisee had since sold a part thereof.[29] An agreement by an administratrix to credit on a note held by her the value of certain work done by the maker should be pleaded as a counterclaim and cannot be interposed as a defense by payment.[30]

[§ 2168] e. Actions on Claims against Estate. In an action on a claim against a decedent's estate no claim other than the one directly covered by the pleadings can be proved.[31] In an action against the executor of one of several makers of a promissory note defendant may give in evidence the survivorship of the other makers without pleading it.[32] If the action is based on the promise of decedent a promise by the representative cannot be given in evidence to establish the demand.[33] In an action on a promise of decedent in which the statute of limitations is pleaded, evidence of a promise made by defendant to pay the claim in suit is not admissible to take the case out of the statute of limitations where the declaration does not allege that the promise was made by him as administrator.[34] Proof that a note presented as a claim against a decedent's estate was executed by mistake can be introduced only when the mistake is properly alleged by equitable counterclaim.[35] In an action on a claim against a decedent's estate, plaintiff is entitled to prove the terms of the will under an allegation that it did not specifically direct how the executor should dispose of the property.[36] In an action to recover disbursements for the benefit of an estate, an item for a certain amount for taxes paid can be supported by evidence of different payments of different amount all tending to make up the sum stated.[37]

Under general issue or denial. Under a statute permitting a personal representative to give any special matter in evidence under the general issue, an administrator sued on a note executed by decedent need not plead payment specially, but may prove it under the general issue,[38] and a set-off may also be shown under the general issue.[39] If, however, a statute requires notice at the time of pleading the general issue that a set-off will be insisted on in evidence, a set-off cannot be given in evidence under the general issue unless such notice is given.[40] Failure to present the claim is provable under the general issue,[41] although the answer does not plead payment, it may be shown that claimant received money from other sources reducing or extinguishing the claim.[42] In an action against an executor or administrator on a claim for money received by decedent, defendant may show, under a general denial, that plaintiff appropriated to his own use articles belonging to decedent,[43] and enjoyed the rents and profits of decedent's land, to the use of which decedent was entitled.[44]

Under plea of payment. In an action against an executor on a note, where the only defense set up is payment, and no special notice of any other defense was given as required by rule of court, evidence will not be admitted at the trial tending to show that the note was given in settlement of a partnership, and represented the amount due to the payee on the adjustment and final settlement of the partnership business, and that the amount represented by the note was not in fact due to the payee on the accounting of the partnership business.[45]

[§ 2169] 4. Variance.[46] In actions by or against executors or administrators, the pleadings and proof must correspond, and there can be no recovery if there is a substantial variance,[47] although an immaterial variance will not prevent a recovery.[48] Where suit is brought by a personal representative in his individual capacity he cannot recover by showing a cause of action accruing to him in his representative capacity,[49] and if he sues in his representative capacity he cannot recover on a cause of action accruing to him in his individual capacity.[50] One who sues on a note as administrator of a decedent's estate can only recover on proof that the note was made to decedent during his lifetime.[51] If a personal representative is sued as such, proof of a claim against him individually will not sustain the declaration,[52] and a suit against him in his individual capacity cannot be maintained by showing a cause of action against decedent.[53] Where plaintiff has a suit pending against defendant as executor all proceedings in other courts intended to create evidence to be used in such suit should be against him in the same character and not in the character of administrator, since an executor represents primarily the devisees and legatees and the administrator represents the heirs at law.[54] If plaintiff describes himself as administrator de bonis non, proof of issuance of general letters of administration to him is not a fatal variance where it is shown that there had been a previous administration,[55] and, where issue is joined on a plea denying that plaintiff is administrator, proof that he is administrator with the will annexed supports the issue.[56] So also if plaintiff declares as administrator, proof that he was administrator de bonis non is an immaterial variance.[57] There is no material variance between a complaint to recover money alleged to have been loaned by plaintiffs individually and evidence that the money was loaned by them as executors,[58] or between the allegations that plaintiff who sues only in his individual capacity recovered a judgment and proof which shows that the judgment was recovered by him in a representative capacity as administrator.[59] Proof that limited letters of administration were granted to plaintiff does not sustain an allegation that unrestricted letters were granted to him, so as to authorize him to maintain an action not designated by the letters.[60] To authorize a joint judgment against two who are sued jointly as executors, the proof must show a joint liability as such;[61] but where several defendants are sued as personal representatives, on a contract made with their decedent, plaintiff may recover a judgment against such of defendants as are shown to be executors or administrators.[62] Where a bill against an administrator avers exhaustion of personal assets and the proof shows a misapplication of those assets, although a liability exists, a decree cannot be granted for the misapplication unless the allegations and prayer shall be amended.[63]

A variance may be cured by the granting of a motion, made at the close of plaintiff's case, without objection by defendants, to conform the pleadings to the proof.[64]

70. Howell v. Howell, 37 Mo. 124; Matter of Nickerson, 5 NYS 841, 2 Conn. Surr. 6.

[a] In a proceeding to recover personal property belonging to the estate of a decedent, of which defendant had taken possession and which he had delivered to others, claiming to have done so in accordance with decedent's wishes, the burden is on defendant to show that the property is not under his control; and where he gives no evidence that he sought to regain the property after he became aware that his action was illegal, and a finding that the property would have been restored to him on request is warranted by the evidence, the property will be considered under his control. Matter of Nickerson, 5 NYS 841, 2 Conn. Surr. 6.

[b] Possession prior to decedent's death.—The fact that the legatee had his legacy in his possession prior to decedent's death affords no conclusive evidence that he had it in his possession at the time of decedent's death, and in an action therefor the burden is upon the personal representative to show that the legatee had possession at the latter time. Enders v. Enders, 2 Barb. (N. Y.) 362.

71. Farmers', etc., Bank v. Leath, 11 Humphr. (Tenn.) 515.

request;[72] that property delivered in payment of debts of the estate, and described as property of the estate, belonged to the estate;[73] and that returns and accounts to the court were made by the representative in his representative capacity, where he has no power to make them in any other.[74] But it will not be presumed that the representative performed a wrongful act in dereliction of his official duty,[75] that he failed to give notice of his appointment where he seeks to use such failure in his own favor;[76] or that there are creditors, in a suit by the representative to assert a right which is good in favor of creditors, but not in favor of heirs.[77] There is no presumption that a foreign legatee, suing for his legacy, has creditors within the state.[78]

As to value of land. Where an administrator who entered on leasehold property of the intestate and received the rents and profits is sued as an assignee of the lease, although it is a good defense that he has no assets, or that the land is not worth the sum due, the presumption is that the land is worth more than the sum demanded.[79]

Heirs are presumed to continue in life until facts are proved from which a different presumption arises, and it is therefore not necessary for an administrator to show affirmatively that his intestate's heirs are living, in order to sustain an action for land conveyed by the intestate conditionally, after the condition is broken.[80]

The fact that previously rendered accounts had been paid by the testator raises no presumption against the allowance of a subsequent account consisting of previous charges, and which is set up as a defense in a suit by an executor against defendant, where is appears that the former accounts were for disbursements only and the latter for services.[81]

In an action for the amount of a book account for goods furnished to an administrator who represents two undivided estates, plaintiff is not bound to prove that the goods were properly applied, or in what proportion they were divided between the two estates, as it is to be presumed that the representative applied them to the purposes for which they were purchased.[82]

Where one renders services to a stranger, who receives the services, the law presumes that he shall be compensated therefor,[83] but it is otherwise where the parties stand in a family relation.[84]

Funeral expenses may under statute be presumed to have been incurred on the credit of the estate.[85]

Publication of notice to creditors. In an action brought by a creditor against an estate more than five years after testator's death, where the complaint shows no cause for the delay, and does not allege that notice to creditors to present their claims was not published, it will be presumed that the executrix performed her duty by seasonably publishing the notice, thereby barring the action one year thereafter.[86]

Collection of assets. Where a husband acted as the wife's agent, and it appears that several of the notes included in a debt, and referred to in the will as being in the wife's possession, were collected by the husband, and that none of them are in existence, it will be presumed, after a lapse of nine years, that he collected all of them, and the estate should be charged with the amount thereof, with interest from the date of the will, especially where testator indorsed them, guaranteeing their payment.[87]

Receipt of proceeds of sale. Where a wife's stock in a turnpike road was sold, and payment made by checks payable to her, which were indorsed by her, she presumably received the proceeds, and they should not be charged as part of the estate's indebtedness to her.[88]

Continuance of title. Where a certificate of stock given by its owner to his wife was discovered after his death with a bank, which claimed it as collateral for a debt of the husband, and the assignment had been changed by erasing the wife's name as assignee and writing in pencil, in place thereof, the bank's name and date, and no evidence was offered showing by whose authority the alterations were made, and the stock was subsequently sold by the bank, and the proceeds applied to the husband's debt, it was held that, the wife having acquired title to the certificate, the presumption was that such title continued until other facts appeared overcoming it, and the reasonable inference was that the wife, to render financial assistance to her husband, permitted a deposit of the certificate as collateral, and that she was entitled to be reimbursed from her husband's estate.[89]

A bank deposit standing in the name of the decedent will be presumed to be his, and the burden of proof is upon the person claiming a title thereto adverse to the representative.[90]

Presumption from failure to produce evidence. Presumptions in favor of testimony arising from the failure of the opposite party to rebut it, where it is obvious that the means to do so are readily accessible to him, do not hold so strongly against the representative as they might against the decedent, if living, in a matter in which the administrator might be at fault for want of knowledge of facts necessary to enable him to make a full defense.[91]

will be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that all legacies and claims against the estate have been paid,[93] and that the estate has been fully settled and distributed by the executor or administrator.[94]

Payment of a debt by decedent may be presumed where it appears that he was amply able to pay his debts.[95]

Wages for domestic services and board bills are presumed to be paid at stated periods.[96] A presumption of payment for services rendered a brother by a sister keeping house and caring for him in his last illness is raised by evidence that he regularly paid her a stated sum per week until his death.[97]

Steele v. Leopold, 135 App. Div. 247, 120 NYS 569 [mod on other grounds 201 N. Y. 518, 94 NE 1099]. (4) Under a statute fixing a limitation of six months for bringing an action for land of an estate conveyed by heirs or devisees in the hands of bona fide purchasers, a creditor, bringing such suit after expiration of the time limited, has the burden of showing that the purchase was not in good faith. Elliott v. Scoville, 144 Ky. 584, 139 SW 806. (5) In a suit by an administrator to recover money transferred by his intestate to defendant in her lifetime, the transaction having been fully consummated, defendant is under no obligation to show a consideration for the transfer, but the burden is on plaintiff to prove that it was invalid for some reason. Murphy v. Fay, 147 App. Div. 574, 132 NYS 574. (6) Where in an action on a claim against the estate of a decedent, the estate claimed, by way of set-off, that claimant had obtained moneys belonging to decedent at a time when he sold a farm for her, and there was evidence that claimant had paid some of the money to a third person at the decedent's request, it was proper to charge that the burden was on him to account for it, as having been paid to the decedent, or disposed of in accordance with her directions. [b] In a suit on a note payable to plaintiff as administrator where plaintiff was so described in the writ, the burden of showing that the note was a debt due to the estate of plaintiff's intestate is on defendant, if he wishes to enforce a set-off in the same right. [c] Where in ejectment against devisees the latter claim title on the ground that they are also heirs, that fact must be affirmatively proved and will not be inferred from the fact that they are near relatives of decedent, unless it is shown that no nearer relatives survive him. [d] Application of proceeds of insurance.—A life policy, payable in part to insured's wife and in part to his mother, is not to be applied to a subsequent debt due to the mother and presented by her against debtor's estate, in the absence of any proof that it was so intended by insured. Pherigo v. Gutman, 150 Ky. 779, 150 SW 1022.
[e] An administrator suing to set aside a conveyance by his intestate to his wife as fraudulent against creditors has the burden of proving fraud, where at the time of the conveyance the intestate was free from debts, except to his wife, and there was a valuable consideration moving from the wife. Sawyer v. Metters, 133 Wis. 350, 113 NW 682.

[g] Receipt of interest.—The burden is on the claimant, in a suit to charge a personal representative with interest during the first two years, to show negligence in not receiving it, but after that time the burden is on him to show why he did not receive it. Howe v. Winn, 150 Ky. 667, 150 SW 842.
[h] In an action for a legatee's interest under a will, which gave the proceeds of the estate to certain persons and their children, and, if any of them died without issue, gave their interest to the living legatees, the burden is on plaintiff to prove that a deceased legatee died without children. the personal representative the burden is on plaintiff to establish all facts necessary to prove his claim,[2] but he is not required to make proof with respect to matters which, if they exist, would properly be matters of defense,[3] the burden being upon the representative to prove all matters upon which he relies by way of defense.[4] In an action for a legacy is it incumbent on plaintiff to show that the legacy was due and payable at the time of the commencement of the action,[5] and where such an action is brought by heirs of the legatee it is incumbent upon them to show that the legatee survived the testator, where the legacy would otherwise lapse.[6] Where an administrator deals with the property in his care to his own advantage the burden is upon him, when the transaction is attacked for fraud, to prove that he acted in good faith.[7] If the action is against the representative for a neglect or breach of trust or duty, the burden is generally on plaintiff to prove such neglect or breach;[8] but where the action is for

"It is true they were not required to make good every ground of defense relied on; but to defeat a recovery it was incumbent upon them to establish one of them. As to the plea of non est factum, the burden of proof was on the appellee; but in respect to the other grounds of defense pleaded in the answer, viz.: No consideration, limitation, and the equitable estoppel growing out of the alleged staleness of appellee's claim, the burden of proof was on the appellants." Radford v. Harris, 144 Ky. 809, 811, 139 SW 963.

[a] Lack of consideration.—(1) Where an administrator of one upon whom an order for funds in his hands was given contests the consideration of such an order, the burden is on him to establish want of consideration. Edwards v. Daley, 14 La. Ann. 384. (2) In a proceeding against an administrator on a note, the burden of introducing testimony to show want of consideration after introduction of the note is on defendant, but he does not have the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that there was no consideration. Farnsworth v. Fraser, 137 Mich. 296, 100 NW 400.

[b] A want of assets to pay a claim when relied upon as a defense by the representative must be proved by him. Troy Bank v. Topping, 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 557 (a note given by the representative prima facie imports a sufficiency of assets and the burden is upon him to show that there was in fact a deficiency); McSorley v. Leary, 1 NYLegObs 410.

[c] On the issue of devastavit and where the representative fails to plead plene administravit the burden is on him to show that assets formerly in his hands were taken away from him without his fault or that without fault he failed to realize on them. [a] The burden of proving maladministration by administrators is on the one who charges it, except that when the administrators admit, or it is shown that they have received, assets, they must account for or produce them. Ladd v. Stephens, 147 Mo. 319, 48 SW 915.

failure to collect debts due the estate it is incumbent upon the representative to prove that he used reasonable diligence and prudence in attempting to make the collection.[9] In an action by heirs for a devastavit the burden is on plaintiffs to show a resulting injury to themselves as heirs.[10] In a suit by an administrator to recover money borrowed from deceased, after showing the original loan, plaintiff is not bound to show that the debt has not been discharged.[11] Where the administrator holds a note of decedent, the fact that it was overdue at the time of decedent's death does not compel the administrator to prove negatively that he did not hold the note in his individual right in the absence of fraud.[12] Where an administrator brings an equitable action to have restored to the estate a portion of its assets, which he has, by mistake as to his authority under the will, conveyed away without consideration, the burden of showing that he is estopped, by reason of his consent to such transfer, from maintaining the action, is on defendant.[13]

[§ 2176] e. In Actions on Written Instruments. While it has been held that the general rule that in an action on a note or other written instrument plaintiff is not bound to prove its execution, unless this is denied by proper plea,[29] applies to actions against a personal representative on notes or instruments executed by decedent;[30] the more generally accepted view is that one suing the representative on a note or other written instrument purporting to be executed by decedent must prove such execution even though this is not denied by the answer.[31]

Where, however, rules of court provide that the execution of a promissory note shall be taken as admitted at the trial unless such execution is denied by affidavit of defense, and require executor and administrators to file affidavits of defense, proof of the execution of the note sued on will not be required where the representative has not filed an affidavit of defense denying such execution.[32] Where the execution of a note by decedent is proved the burden of proving want of consideration is on defendant representative.[33] In an action against an estate for the amount of a note given by defendant as representative, the burden is upon plaintiff to show that the cause of action arose upon a contract made by decedent in his lifetime, that the original claim or debt was not extinguished by the acceptance of the note, and that there was an assignment to him of the original claim to the extent of the note.[34] In an action on an official bond signed by decedent the acknowledgment of the bond as provided for by statute is prima facie evidence of the signature and execution of the bond and plaintiff need not introduce extrinsic proof of decedent's signature, unless defendant introduces evidence to overcome the prima facie proof of execution made by the acknowledgment.[35]

[§ 2177] f. On Plea on Plene Administravit. Where in an action against a personal representative the latter pleads plene administravit and an issue is joined thereon, the burden is on plaintiff to show assets unadministered in defendant's hands at the time the action was commenced, applicable to the payment of his claim;[36] to produce a copy of the inventory of the estate from the public records, if he wishes thereby to charge the administrator with assets;[37] and to show notice of his claim by the representative before distribution.[38]

Werbiskie v. McManus, 31 Tex. 116. (2) When the representative character of an administrator is put in issue, he will be required to exhibit a copy of the letters of administration authenticated as the act of congress directs, together with the certificate of the proper officer that they were granted in pursuance of, and conformable to, the laws of the state in which they were granted. his representative character.[42] Where the suit is against the representative as such, the burden is on plaintiff to prove not only the representative's appointment, but also that he had taken upon himself the trust,[43] unless the suit is upon a decree of the probate court against the representative, in which case such decree is of itself evidence of the appointment, and plaintiff need not prove it.[44]

[§ 2179] 3. Admissibility[45]—a. In General. The admissibility of evidence in actions by or against a personal representative depends upon the nature of the fact sought to be proved;[46] and the general rules of evidence[47] must be applied, so as to receive any evidence which is a proper character and legitimately tends to support or refute the contentions of the parties,[48] and to exclude evidence which is irrelevant, incompetent, immaterial, or of such a character that it is not proper to presentation and consideration.[49] For example evidence is admissible in an action for a legacy which tends to show that property existed, subject to such legacy, during the lifetime of the testator,[50] or that assets came into the hands of the executor,[51] or by the exercise of due diligence on his part, might have come into his hands.[52] Plaintiff in an action against the representative may introduce evidence as to the validity of his claim at the time the indebtedness was incurred, and if he sees proper may show the subsequent conduct of decedent or his representative;[53] and to reduce his personal liability, the representative may prove payments which the probate court through mistake has disallowed,[54] but he cannot give in evidence his own acts or declarations or those of his decedent subsequent to contracting the debt for the purpose of discharging the estate from liability.[55] A claim filed against an administrator is admissible in an action against him for a certain sum, although the claim filed exceeds the sum by the amount of interest due.[56]

In an action for services rendered or board and lodging furnished to decedent, any competent evidence which legitimately bears on the issues should be received.[57] Evidence is admissible to show the financial condition of decedent,[58] the character and extent[59] and value[60] of the services rendered, that a bequest or devise was made in favor of plaintiff,[61] or that the employment was by another than decedent;[62] or if such services were rendered by a member of decedent's family, or a near relative, to show either an express agreement, or facts from which an implied agreement to pay therefor may be inferred.[63] But evidence which does not throw light on the issues or is of a character which is not proper for acceptance or consideration should be rejected.[64]

[a] As foundation of other evidence.—In an action to recover a claim founded on certain receipts which had been signed by an intestate jointly with others, they are admissible as a foundation or other evidence of the several liability, but not to fix the liability of the intestate's estate, it being a joint undertaking. Kimball v. Kimball, 16 Mich. 211.

71. Smith v. Kimball, 105 Mass. 499; Melvin v. Stephens, 82 N. C. 283.

72. Field v. Bevil, 12 Ala. 608 (receipts and vouchers found among decedent's papers are inadmissible as proof of payment, without connection with other facts and circumstances pertinent to the issue).

73. Schupp v. Schupp, 1 Pa. Cas. 283, 2 A 870 (under the rule of the courts of common pleas of Allegheny county, admitting as evidence such portions of the affidavit of claim as are not denied by the affidavit of defense, the affidavit of claim of an administrator suing in his representative capacity is admissible). But compare Adkins v. Hutchings, 79 Ga. 260, 4 SE 887 (affidavits of accounts found among a deceased administrator's papers connected with the intestate's estate are ex parte and merely hearsay, and are inadmissible in an action against an administrator, appointed in his place, for not collecting certain debts).

[a] The record of a former judgment against lessees for nonperformance of covenants is admissible in an action by them against administrators on a bond given by the intestate for performance of covenants in the lease. Reber v. Gilson, 1 Pa. 54.

[b] A citation and order of court directing parties to deliver assets to administrator is competent evidence to charge defendants in a subsequent action by the administrator for the value of the assets. Bright v. Ecker, 9 S. D. 192, 68 NW 326.

[c] In an action against an executor upon a note it is competent for defendant who denies the execution of the note under oath to introduce the record of a former judgment in his favor against the executor, in a proceeding in which the debt sued on could have been pleaded as an offset, and was not. Smyth v. Caswell, 67 Tex. 567, 4 SW 848.

[d] Decree granting letters of administration.—In an action against an administrator on a debt due from the intestate, a decree granting letters of administration is admissible as evidence that defendant is administrator and bound to pay the debt. Day v. Floyd, 130 Mass. 488.

[e] On an issue whether decedent was indebted to plaintiff on a note destroyed by fire, the auditor's report and decree of the orphans' court granting leave to mortgage real estate are inadmissible to show that decedent did not have personal property sufficient to pay his debts, and that consequently the claim must be a just one. Simpson v. Irvin, 5 Pa. Super. 471.

[f] A decree setting aside a deed which had been given to plaintiff as compensation for services rendered decedent is admissible in an action for such services to show that they had not been paid or provided for. Davis v. Duval, 111 N. C. 422, 16 SE 471, 112 N. C. 833, 17 SE 528.

[a] Thus a will is admissible in an action for services rendered or board furnished decedent, to show whether or not plaintiff took a bequest thereunder, and as bearing upon the supposed undertaking to pay wages. Allen v. Field, 124 Mich. 466, 83 NW 151; Cowell v. Roberts, 79 Mo. 218; Allen v. Allen, 101 Mo. A. 676, 74 SW 396; Hughes v. Keichline, 168 Pa. 115, 31 A 887.

[b] When immaterial.—The will is properly excluded in an action against an executor to recover rent of land, where there is no question of the fact that plaintiff was the owner of the land. Parker v. Salmons, 113 Ga. 1167, 39 SE 475.

Rooker v. Rodwell, 165 N. C. 80, 80 SE 971.

[b] Notes.—(1) Where an executor sues to recover money claimed by defendant as a gift from the testator, he may, to show fraud, put in evidence a note given by the testator to himself before the time of the gift. Jones v. Jones, 41 Hun (N. Y.) 163. (2) The notes, on the guaranty of which by deceased the claim is based, are admissible in evidence without proof of their execution, in the absence of an affidavit denying the execution. De Clerque v. Campbell, 231 Ill. 442, 83 NE 224. (3) The admission of a note, executed by the father for services and delivered to a third person in support of the child's claim, is not objectionable on the theory that the note was void as a gift for want of delivery. Abel v. Roosenraad, 172 Mich. 93, 138 NW 325. (4) Athough a note belonging to a decedent's estate is sued on before appraisement and without inrepresentative are also admissible in such actions for what they purport to express. But a written agreement between an executrix and a claimant against the estate, which recited that the claimant claimed a certain sum without interest, which claim was not prejudiced by the agreement, is not admissible as an agreement not to claim interest or as an estoppel from claiming interest.[77]

dorsement of appraisal, it is admissible as evidence, if appraised and indorsed at any time before trial. Painter v. Long, 69 W. Va. 765, 72 SE 1092. (5) A note given by one of several administrators, admitting a sum of money to be due from the intestate's estate, is not admissible in evidence in a suit against a co-administrator unless accompanied by proof of an original indebtedness upon which such note was founded. Weston v. Murnan, 4 Ind. 271.

[c] Letters.—Whitcomb v. Whitcomb, 217 Mass. 558, 105 NE 613; In re Davis, 200 Mich. 500, 166 NW 899.

[d] Claim and letter.—In an action on a note against the administrator of a deceased maker, it was competent for plaintiffs to introduce the claim that had been rejected by the administrator, and the letter accompanying the rejection, to show that no voucher had been required from plaintiffs. Poncin v. Furth, 15 Wash. 201, 46 P 241.

[e] Deed.—Marchant v. Young, 147 Ga. 37, 92 SE 863.

[f] Bank book.—Direct proof should be alleged to support a claim for trust moneys against decedent, and the decedent's own deposit book, without other earmark or evidence, is inadmissible to sustain such a claim. Bagnall v. Roach, 76 Cal. 106, 18 P 137.

[g] An arbitration bond given by administrators individually is inadmissible in an action against them as administrators. Mahaffey v. Mahaffey, 13 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 163.

[h] Plaintiff's unsworn statement of a debt, which consisted of copies of the notes, and the statement that decedent promised to pay, but did not do so, is inadmissible in an action against an executor on notes alleged to have been executed by the testator. Perkins v. Humes, 200 Pa. 235, 49 A 934.

[i] On plene administravit.—(1) A settlement by executors with the county court is admissible in a contest between a creditor and the personal representatives, whether made before or after suit brought, as prima facie evidence on the issue of plene administravit; but such settlement will prove nothing, unless it shows the dates of the payments, and whether made on judgments, specialties, or simple contracts. Cochran v. Davis, 5 Litt. (Ky.) 118. To like effect Mountjoy v. Lowry, 4 Hen. & M. (14 Va.) 428; Atwell v. Milton, 4 Hen. & M. (14 Va.) 253. (2) To disprove such a plea a lease duly executed to the testator, at annual rent, may be read in evidence, although it had not been returned in the inventory to the orphans' court, and although no notice had been given to defendant that it was intended to be offered in evidence, to show fraud or want of truth in the inventory. Dukehart v. State, 4 Harr, & J. (Md.) 506.

[j] Plat and survey.—In a suit for specific performance, a plat and survey ordered by the administrator are not rendered inadmissible by proof that a successor has been appointed. Mills v. McLanahan, 70 W. Va. 288, 73 SE 927.

[k] Where an administrator assumes the defense of an action brought against his intestate, it becomes an action against him, within a statute providing that, where an action by an administrator is supported by oral testimony of a promise or statement made by his intestate, evidence of the latter's written or oral statement, memoranda, and entries written by him, and of his act and habits of dealings, shall be admissible to disprove such statement or promise. Brooks v. Holden, 175 Mass. 137, 55 NE 802.

[a] Supplying seal.—Where such letters are excluded for want of a seal, the seal may thereafter be affixed so as to render them admissible. Maloney v. Woodin, 11 Hun (N. Y.) 202.

[b] Unauthenticated letters not admissible.—Letters of administration de bonis non with the will annexed are inoperative unless authenticated by the official seal of the orphans' court by which they were granted; and hence, unless so authenticated, are not admissible in an action by the administrator to prove his authority to sue. Tuck v. Boone, 8 Gill (Md.) 187.

80. Farrand v. Caton, 69 Mich. 235, 37 NW 199.

[a] Certificate of appointment.—In an action by a foreign administrator, a certificate of the clerk of the surrogate's court of the foreign state that letters were granted to plaintiff is inadmissible. Cromley v. Dean, 177 Ill. A. 67.

81. Dickinson v. McCraw, 4 Rand. (25 Va.) 158.

[a] As proof of death.—In an action by an executor, the order of the court probating the will and appointing the executor is admissible and prima facie proof of testator's death and of the existence of facts authorizing such order. Fischer v. Giddings, 43 Tex. Civ. A. 393, 95 SW 33. To same effect Wagner v. Alderson, 91 Wash. 157, 157 P 476 (decree granting letters of administration).

[b] When irrelevant.—Where, in an action to quiet title by a decedent's administrator and his heirs at law, defendant's answer did not deny plaintiff's appointment and qualification as administrator, a probate order of appointment, showing the date of decedent's death, was irrelevant, the date of such death not being essential to confer jurisdiction on the probate court, nor necessary for decision on the application for administration. Layne v. Johnson, 19 Cal. A. 95, 124 P 860.

82. Shaw v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 101 App. Div. 246, 91 NYS 746.

[a] Reason for rule.—The inventory required by law to be made and returned by an administrator is partly for information of creditors of the estate; and where the administrator of one of the creditors is sued for failing to collect from the administrator of the debtor, the inventory made and returned by the latter is admissible in evidence to show means of information of which the former might have availed himself touching the debtor's estate and the particular property of which it apparently consisted. Thompson v. Thompson, 77 Ga. 692, 3 SE 261.

[b] Illustration.—In an action against an administrator on notes alleged to have been executed by his intestate, where the defense is wanting of consideration, in order to prove that after the death of the intestate no trace of such a sum as that alleged to have been borrowed could be found among the assets, the administrator may testify as to an inventory made by him of all the personal estate, and the reading of the names and amounts from such paper as part of his testimony is not reversible error. Bogie v. Nolan, 96 Mo. 85, 9 SW 14.

[c] An inventory made and returned by an administrator, after he has commenced an action for the recovery of the property included therein, is not competent evidence for him at the trial of the cause, he being personally liable to costs. Allender v. Riston, 2 Gill & J. (Md.) 86.

[d] An appraisement made by commissioners appointed for that purpose may not be admissible as evidence against the representative, unless he connects himself with it in some way; yet, if he makes it the basis of a petition for the sale of property, this is a sufficient adoption of it as his inventory, no other inventory being shown. Glover v. Hill, 85 Ala. 41, 4 S 613.

fied copy thereof from the record [86] is admissible for or against the representative, either for the purpose of releasing him from liability for certain assets, or of charging him therewith. But the parties in adverse interest seeking to charge the representative or his estate may prove the facts purporting to be shown by such inventory without reference to it.[87]

[§ 2183] 4. Weight and Sufficiency—a. In General. The weight and sufficiency of evidence in actions by or against a personal representative are governed by the general rules of evidence, which have been fully discussed elsewhere.[88] Subject to such rules the sufficiency of evidence in these actions depends entirely upon the nature of the issue or matter to be proved,[89] and reference is made in the note to a number of illustrative cases in which the sufficiency of the evidence adduced has been considered and passed upon.[90] A transcript of record from the probate court of all the proceedings, showing that a settlement was ordered, but not showing that it was ever made, or that the administrators had ever resigned, died, or been removed, is affirmative evidence of no vacancy of the administrator's

Hill v. Fly, (Tenn. Ch. A.) 52 SW 731.

[b] Avoidance of statute of nonclaim.—Where plaintiff avers in a writ begun against the administrator more than two years after notice of his appointment that the cause of action had been fraudulently concealed from plaintiff by defendant, plaintiff's testimony that defendant promised before he was appointed administrator that he would see to plaintiff's account against the estate and that defendant had neglected to do so is not sufficient evidence from which a jury could find such fraudulent concealment. [a] Evidence held sufficient: To establish: (1) A debt due by a creditor to the estate, as a cross account in a suit to enjoin the sale of decedent's real estate to pay such creditor. Jones v. Walker, (Tenn. Ch. A.) 57 SW 384. (2) A prima facie case for the return of money paid so as to render dismissal improper. Friedlander v. Fleischauer, 132 NYS 508. (3) As against an executor, the ownership of a house and lot claimed as part of decedent's estate. Liter v. Johnson, 78 SW 905, 25 KyL 1783. (4) To justify a finding that deeds were executed in fraud of legatees. Barnard v. Keathley, 230 Mo. 209, 130 SW 306. (5) To prevent nonsuit in action for widow's allowance. Wood v. Brown, 121 Ga. 471, 49 SE 295. (6) To rebut the presumption that money found in the decedent's house at the time of his death belonged to him. Weiss' App., 133 Pa. 84, 19 A 311. (7) To refute claim for part of profits of partnership. Justis v. Justis, 99 Md. 69, 57 A 23. To show: (8) Acquiescence in modification of contract. Gauss v. Trump, 48 Mont. 92, 135 P 910. (12) Contract for support as against motion for nonsuit. Mitchell v. Brown, 18 Cal. A. 117, 122 P 426. (13) Fraud. Hipkins v. Estes, 51 Wash. 1, 97 P 1089. (14) Ownership of money, Stuyvaert v. Arnold, 122 Mo. A. 421, 99 SW 529. (15) Payment. Zonig v. Boehme, 60 Wash. 500, 111 P 566. (16) Settlement of ownership of personalty. Diem v. Drogmiller, 158 Mich. 380, 122 NW 637. (17) That check should not be applied toward payment of judgment. Panezzi's Est., 40 Pa. Super. 282. (18) That compensation for services was fixed by contract. Matter of Mosher, 103 App. Div. 459, 93 NYS 123 [aff 185 N. Y. 556, 77 NE 1191]. (19) That decedent was the owner of a note found among his effects. Hair v. Edwards, 104 Mo. A. 213, 77 SW 1089. (20) That note given by decedent to defendant did not represent a valid indebtedness. Varick v. Hitt, (Ch.) 55 A 139 [aff 66 N. J. Eq. 442, 57 A 406]. (21) That tenant in common had not paid to his cotenant the latter's share of the proceeds of the common prop-

office.[91] Declarations against interest may be sufficient,[92] as also may circumstantial evidence,[93] to make out at least a prima facie case for the one offering it.[94] The acknowledgment by an administrator that an account is just is not sufficient evidence to warrant a judgment de bonis testatoris.[95] An inventory of the estate is prima facie evidence of the solvency of those stated therein to owe the estate,[96] and of the fact that such persons are indebted to the estate.[97]

To charge a representative with a devastavit the failure of an executor to pay a debt when the estate is solvent, and his allowing judgment to be taken and stay to be entered, is prima facie evidence of waste, if the estate subsequently became insolvent,[98] but where it is attempted to charge him for the payment of a debt barred by limitations, and it is acknowledged that the debt was just, the executor will not be put to so strict proof that the delay was at his request, as where a creditor of the estate is attempting to enforce a claim against the executor.[99]

In an action to recover land under a statute authorizing the representative to recover possession of any part of an estate from the heirs or their purchasers, when necessary for the purpose of paying debts or making distribution, an order of sale granted by the court of ordinary is at least prima facie evidence that such sale was necessary to pay debts, and is sufficient to sustain a verdict for so much of the land sued for as is embraced in such order,[1] but is not sufficient to sustain a verdict for the parcels to which the order does not relate.[2]

To sustain a plea of property in a defendant as administrator the evidence should be such that the jury should believe from it not only that defendant was defending as administrator in good faith, but also that the property in controversy belonged to the estate of his intestate, and not plaintiff.[3]

Proof of set-off. Proof of the existence merely of a debt which might have been applied as a set-off to a demand against the estate does not raise a presumption that the debt was so applied, when neither the minutes of the probate court nor the account presented and allowed against the estate shows anything in relation to the set-off, although claimant on presenting his claim filed the affidavit prescribed by statute that he had allowed all just credits against the claim.[4]

Proof of administration bond.—Evidence of the clerk of probate that he had been unable to find in his office any bond relating to the administration of an estate fifteen years before, and that he did not know whether any such bond had been filed, as at that early day no papers were recorded, and attorneys frequently took out and kept such papers for months, does not show conclusively that no bond was given.[5]

In trespass, replevin, or trover by a representative for the recovery of a chattel or its value, his possession of the chattel at the time it was taken or converted is prima facie proof of his title.[6]

[§ 2184] b. As to Existence of Indebtedness. Public policy requires that claims against the estate should be carefully scrutinized and admitted only upon very satisfactory proof,[7] and it is therefore erty so as to defeat the action of the cotenant's executrix to recover it. Williams v. Williams, 109 Me. 537, 85 A 43. (22) That widow and children, as well as widow's brother, upon whose advice she relied, advised the continuance of decedent's business by administrator as being for the best interests of estate. Swaine v. Hemphill, 165 Mich. 561, 131 NW 68, 40 LRANS 201. (23) Want of consideration for note. Kolb v. Stephens, 176 Ill. A. 391. To support: (24) Findings that decedent pledged stock to secure notes and that notes were not paid. Savings Union Bank, etc., Co. v. Crowley, 176 Cal. 543, 169 P 67. (25) Judgment for defendant upon issue that an allowance to him for services was wrongfully made. Taylor v. Harrison, 35 SW 908, 18 KyL 164. To sustain finding: (26) As to an agreement for an interest in a note. Ryan v. Ford, 151 Mo. A. 689, 132 SW 610. (27) That claim arose from debt of firm in which deceased was partner. In re Morgan, 46 Or. 233, 77 P 608, 78 P 1029. (28) That sale was made under direction of distributee. State v. Dickson, 213 Mo. 66, 111 SW 817. (29) That testator's business was carried on by his son on his own account, and not as agent of the executrix. American Tube Works v. Tucker, 185 Mass. 236, 70 NE 59. (30) That trust deed was executed primarily for grantor's personal indebtedness, as distinguished from his liability as indorser on certain notes. In re Thomson, 165 Cal. 290, 131 P 1045. (31) To warrant finding that executrix had in her possession funds belonging to the estate sufficient to pay judgment and that such judgment was the only claim. In re Macdonald, 29 Wash. 422, 69 P 1111.

[b] Evidence held insufficient: To establish: (1) Contract to assure to plaintiff a large amount on decedent's death. Roberge v. Bonner, 94 App. Div. 342, 88 NYS 91 [aff 185 N. generally held that evidence to establish such an indebtedness should be clear, certain, and satisfactory,[8] and it has been said that an action of this kind must be maintained by evidence which is more cogent than such as would suffice to sustain an action against a living person.[9] Whether or not the evidence is sufficient depends upon the circumstances of the particular case,[10] and while no general rule can be laid down, reference is made in the notes to a number of illustrative cases in which the evidence adduced has been held sufficient[11] or

"The court is of opinion that the evidence required to establish an ante mortem contract that results in a post mortem disposition of an estate must come within the rule governing the quality of proof required to establish the reformation of an instrument, to prove the contents of a lost will, or a deed, or an agreement to bequeath by will. We can conceive of no class of cases in which a higher kind of proof should be demanded than that which seeks to establish oral contract calculated to subvert the muniments of title and divert descent of intestate property from its legal channel. No class is more susceptible to the temptation of fraud and none in which it can be more easily practiced." Liberty v. Haines, 103 Me. 182, 193, 68 A 738.

(2) "Heirs and devisees have a right to a day in court before their interests can be affected by a judgment against the administrator, and they may question and disprove any and every item concluded in or constituting the judgment against the administrator, if they can; so that in fact, the only importance of the judgment against the administrator, so far as an interest in the realty is concerned, is, that it is prima facie evidence of a debt due by the estate, and the foundation for a proceeding to try whether or not the realty is chargeable with it." [a] Limitation of rule.—A statute providing that no claim which shall have been rejected by the executor or administrator shall be allowed by any court, referee, or jury, except upon some competent or satisfactory evidence other than the testimony of the claimant, applies only on the trial on the merits of a rejected claim, and not to the preliminary question as to whether there was due presentation and disallowance within a reasonable time. Goltra v. Penland, 45 Or. 254, 77 P 129.

[b] The probate judge is not bound by the rule requiring corroborative proof. Re Blank, 5 Terr. L. 230.

Corroboration of the claimant is sometimes required in order to establish the claim,[13] but the corroborative evidence may, it has been held, be furnished by one who is interested,[14] or by books of account,[15] or inference arising from facts proved may afford sufficient corroboration.[16] The rule does not require that the claim be proved entirely by evidence independent of the testimony of the claimant,[17] and it has been held that the general rule requiring corroboration does not preclude giving effect to a claim where the uncorroborated testimony of the claimant is completely convincing.[18]

Where a person who stood in a family relation to decedent seeks to recover for services rendered to decedent, the claim will be carefully scrutinized, and a recovery permitted only when the rendition of the services and the contract to pay therefor or the mutual understanding that they should be paid for are established by clear and convincing evidence.[19] It is not necessary, however, that a contract or understanding that the claimant should be paid for the services rendered should be established beyond a reasonable doubt, but a clear preponderance of evidence is sufficient.[20] In the absence of any statute to the contrary, such a claim may be established by parol evidence,[21] or on the theory of an implied promise made by the decedent to pay for services rendered by a relative;[22] but where a parol agreement is relied on to establish the right to payment, the evidence establishing such agreement must be given, or at least corroborated in all substantial particulars, by disinterested witnesses.[23]

A written acknowledgment of a debt by decedent is in general sufficient to show an indebtedness due by the estate in the hands of the personal representative,[24] in the absence of proof of payment,[25] even though the debt is denied by the representative on information and belief.[26] But such acknowledgment may be overcome by proof of subsequent statements made by plaintiff that decedent "did not owe him anything.'' [27]

A will directing payment of a debt alleged to be due to the testator, within a certain time, is not in itself such evidence of the indebtedness as will support an action of assumpsit thereon by the executor.[28]

Admissions of the representative are prima facie evidence of the liability of his decedent's estate for a claim made upon it,[29] as is also his inventory of the debts stated therein.[30]

Allowance of a claim by the commissioners on claims is sufficient prima facie to establish the claim.[31]

A verified proof of claim filed in the county court has been held sufficient to warrant the district court on appeal from the county court, in rendering judgment in favor of the claimant.[32]

[§ 2185] c. As to Representative Capacity. In accordance with the rule that letters testamentary and of administration are prima facie evidence of all they purport to show, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary, are conclusive of the appointment and qualification of the legal representative,[33] such letters properly authenticated, or duly certified copies thereof,[34] are sufficient proof of the representative's right to enforce or protect rights of the estate he assumes to represent,[35] unless it appears that such letters have been revoked [36] or that the representative's authority has otherwise been terminated. It has been held that such letters are the only proper proof of authority,[37] unless it is shown that they are lost or destroyed;[38] but it is also held that the record showing the representative's appointment and qualification, and his acts of administration thereunder, may constitute sufficient evidence of his authority.[39] It has also been

[a] The original letters of administration and the bond duly filed and recorded are sufficient evidence of the right of the administrator to sue in behalf of the estate. Wilson v. Ireland, 4 Md. 444.

[b] The possession of letters of administration by the person to whom they purport to be granted is prima facie evidence of delivery; and no proof being offered to rebut that presumption it must be held conclusive. Hensley v. Dodge, 7 Mo. 470; McNiar v. Dodge, 7 Mo. 404.

[c] Letters of administration granted on an unverified petition are prima facie proof that they were properly issued, and it is incumbent on a person claiming that they were improperly issued to establish that fact by affirmative proof. Shaw v. New York Cent., etc., R. Co., 101 App. Div. 246, 91 NYS 746.

[g] Where two sets of letters of administration are offered in a case, one to the court only, to lay the foundation for the second set by showing the expiration of the first, and the second to the jury, to show a substitution of plaintiff as administrator, and as conclusive proof of his right to sue, it is not error in the court to charge that the second set is conclusive of plaintiff's right to sue. Halbert v. Carroll, (Tex. Civ. A.) 25 SW 1102.

[b] Under a statute authorizing the sheriff to act as administrator in certain cases, when ordered by the probate court, a certified copy of the order directing him to act as such is proper evidence of his authority. Davis v. Shuler, 14 Fla. 438.

[c] Public administrator. — The exhibition of a decree of the court in which the succession was opened, authorizing plaintiff to administer the same according to law in his capacity of public administrator, and, as such, an officer of the parish as well as of the court, is at least a prima facie showing of capacity and authority to sue and stand in judgment in another parish. Morse v. Griffith, 25 La. Ann. 213.

[d] The appointment of executors (1) is sufficiently shown by a certified copy of the will, and of the proceedings of the court probating the will and appointing the executors, and their qualification thereunder (Wolfe v. Underwood, 97 Ala. 375, 12 S 234; Blaen Avon Coal Co. v. McCulloh, 59 Md. 403, 43 AmR 560; Wright v. Mongle, 10 Lea. (Tenn.) 38), and (2) by the exhibition and passage by the court of their accounts as executors showing among other matters the specific allowance held that one's representative capacity may be shown by his own testimony, not objected to,[40] by a deed from him, describing himself as representative,[41] or by his appearance in an action against him as administrator.[42] An admission by a representative, in an action against him, is not sufficient proof of his representative capacity;[43] nor is his refusal to accept or protest an order presented to him for payment of a debt of the estate, or his appearnance and resistance to a suit on it, sufficient proof of such capacity.[44] It has also been held that testimony by a wife that she is administratrix of her husband is not proof that she was duly qualified and acting as such at the filing of the petition in an action for his death by wrongful act.[45]

[§ 2186] d. As to Assets. Where in an action against a personal representative, the existence of assets is in issue, a prima facie case is made out as to their existence by showing that the representative had filed an inventory showing more assets in his hands than the amount sued for;[46] by showing that he had received property of the estate and had omitted to file or exhibit any inventory;[47] by showing that a judgment had been rendered in his favor;[48] or where an executor, who is sole residuary legatee, gives bond to pay all debts and legacies, by showing his appointment and the giving of such bond.[49] The mere signing of a note by executors is prima facie evidence of assets in their hands sufficient to pay it, and they are personally liable unless they show that such assets are insufficient.[50] A plea of plene administravit is sustained by proof that the legal assets had been fully administered,[51] and this can be shown only by regular probate proceedings.[52]

[§ 2187] e. As to Allowance or Rejection of Claim. Under a statute allowing suit only on a rejected claim, it has been held that the fact of rejection, when in issue, must be shown to have been decided, unequivocal, and absolute.[53]

[§ 2188] f. Effect of Admissions.[54] The general rule is that admissions made by a personal representative prior to his assumption of official duties are not evidence against him in his representative capacity;[55] but an admission made by him while engaged in the discharge of his duties as such binds the estate to that extent.[56] He cannot, however, render the estate liable for a claim otherwise invalid, by his admissions.[57]

[§ 2189] Q. Trial[58]—1. Course and Conduct Generally. While an executor or administrator may not admit a liability against the estate, he must in the trial of a case be bound by the rules of law which regulate the practice in court.[59] In an action by or against a representative the issues framed are sometimes tried by the jury as in other suits, although questions of fact as well as of law are frequently determined by the court alone.[60] Under some statutes such actions are entitled to a preference on the court calendar.[61] A plea of the statute of nonclaim in a proceeding in chancery against several defendants may be allowed at the time of the argument, or the court may let it stand over of a fee paid by them to the register for issuing the letters (Blaen Avon Coal Co. v. McCulloh, supra). (3) But proof of the execution of the will alone, without showing that probate was granted to the one claiming to be the executor, is insufficient. Newton v. Cocke, 10 Ark. 169; —— v. Oldham, 2 N. C. 165.

41. Bratt v. Bratt, 21 Md. 578 (a deed from an administratrix, describing her as such, to defendant, in a proceeding in equity to enforce her lien on the property for the purchase money, is sufficient evidence of the capacity in which she sues).

42. Squires v. Martin, 24 Oh. Cir. Ct. 232 (where in an action against an administrator before a justice of the peace, defendant as such administrator appears and contests plaintiff's claim, such appearance is sufficient evidence of his capacity as administrator, and a claim on appeal that there was no evidence on the trial that he was the administrator cannot be considered).

43. Howard v. Daniel, 6 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 125 (even though such an admission was good as against the one making it, it would not be sufficient evidence of the representative capacity of his alleged corepresentatives).

[a] No jury trial as of right.—In an action against a representative by a legatee for the amount due, and for an order directing the conversion of the estate into money, and payment of the legacy out of the proceeds, it has been held that defendant's representative is not entitled to a trial by jury as a matter of right and that such a trial may be refused, especially where the evidence is not sufficient to be submitted to the jury. Gilbert v. Morrison, 53 Hun 442, 6 NYS 491.

[b] If a personal representative pleads "fully administered" in an action against him, the plea will be tried by the jury if the action is tried in the county court, but by the justice alone if the cause is tried in the justice's court where the plea is properly pleaded. Anderson v. Clark, 2 Swan (Tenn.) 156.

61. Haux v. Dry Dock Sav. Inst., 150 N. Y. 581, 44 NE 1099 (the statute which entitles a cause in which an executor or administrator is sole plaintiff or sole defendant to the preference on the court calendar does not apply to an action brought by an executor suing in both his representative and individual capacities).

until the final hearing of the cause.[62] Where several bills are pending against the representative over essentially the same cause of litigation, they should all be brought to a hearing at the same time if possible, in order that a final disposition may at the same time be made of all the questions arising on all of them.[63] In an administrator's suit to set aside a fraudulent conveyance by decedent, it is not necessary for the master to audit the various bills upon which he reported on the question of deficiency of assets, where he has reported bills for administration expenses to double the amount of assets.[64]

Accounting. In the course of the proceedings the complainant may be entitled to an accounting;[65] and if an examination of accounts and calculations is necessary to ascertain plaintiff's demand, the usual practice is to make a reference to a master or an auditor, so as to reduce the points to be disputed to as few a number as possible.[66]

A stay or continuance of the proceedings may be had under some statutes for the purpose of allowing the representative's account to be settled,[67] of permitting proper persons to be made parties to the proceedings,[68] of permitting an answer to be filed upon prescribed terms and conditions,[69] or for the appointment of an administrator de bonis non and his substitution as plaintiff, where the original administrator has become disqualified.[70] Where a plea of plene administravit is found for a representative and scire facias issued to the heirs, the representative is continued in court until the heirs come in to make up an issue;[71] and the representative is not compelled to try the issue at the same term at which it is made up.[72]

Affidavit of assets. Where in an action against an administrator there have been ascertained the debts of the creditors and the account of assets in defendant's hands, reserving for further consideration a certain amount with which it was supposed defendant was wrongfully charged, and the complainant asks leave to file a supplemental bill, the court may require him to show by affidavit that the assets which he proposes to charge were not charged in the former bill and that assets are in defendant's hands.[73]

[§ 2190] 2. Reception of Evidence. While the representative may waive formal mode of proof in a suit to which he is a party,[74] it is generally his duty to object to a witness or to proof where a proper case for such objection arises,[75] and if he fails to do so, whether through ignorance, inadvertence, collusion, or fraud, any other person interested in the suit may make such objection.[76]

Time for production. Probate of notes admitted in evidence without objection under a plea of set-off in an action by an administrator are produced in time when produced at the conclusion of the testimony on both sides, and after a motion has been made for the exclusion of the notes for want of probates.[77]

Order of proof. In an action for services it is not error, requiring a new trial, to permit proof of the value of the services before proof of prima facie liability.[78]

[§ 2191] 3. Questions of Law and Fact. In an action by or against an executor or administrator it is for the jury to determine questions of fact,[79] such as the ownership of an unindorsed note made to the order of decedent,[80] the validity of a claim asserted against the estate,[81] the existence of assets

[a] Waiver of accounting. — Where, on an accounting with an administratrix as to money held by her decedent, it is admitted that decedent in his life made a formal statement of his account with complainant, and that such account was unpaid, complainant may waive his right to an accounting, and stand on the balance shown by such statement, where his remedy is sufficient without it. St. c 31 § 119, authorizing references to be made in courts of law to state the accounts of administrators, executors, etc., applies only to suits brought upon their bonds respectively, and not to suits brought on bonds given by a testator or intestate, in which fully administered is pleaded. [b] Limits of account.—Where a creditor brings a bill to enforce a testamentary charge to pay debts, the court of chancery will not take an account of the personal estate but will leave the orphans' court in which the account has been filed to complete it, where circumstances do not require the court of chancery to act. [§ 2192] 4. Instructions. Instructions in actions by or against a personal representative are regulated entirely by the general rules of instructions in civil actions,[8] and by the facts and issues of the particular case.[9] The court should in case of dispute instruct the jury as to whether or not the alleged appointment of the personal representative was valid.[10] It should also charge the jury as to the legal effect of the evidence,[11] as that the jury should not consider an admission of indebtedness of the estate, by one only of two or more corepresentatives.[12] But it should not give instructions which are inapplicable to the issues and misleading[13] or unwarranted by the evidence,[14] or which relate to immaterial matters[15] or matters not in issue[16] or are likely to exclude from the consideration of the jury important matters.[17] Nor need the court give further instructions on matters that are already covered by other instruction.[18] Plaintiff in an action against an administrator is not entitled to an instruction balancing his inability to testify against defendant's difficulty of not having decedent's testimony.[19] Reference is made in the note to a number of illustrative cases in which the courts have passed on the propriety of particular instructions in actions on claims against the estate,[20] actions for services performed for decedent[21] by a relative or member of his family,[22] an action involving a charge of devastavit,[23] an action cedent's will should be allowed out of the estate).

[a] Erroneous charge as to duty to distribute.—In an action against executors, a charge that if, when the will was about to be probated in solemn form, there was an agreement among all the heirs that the estate should be collected and turned over to the widow, and the widow had distributed under that agreement, defendants would not be liable, was erroneous in requiring distribution by the widow pursuant to the agreement to release defendants from liability. [a] Thus (1) the court may tell the jury that it is immaterial when plaintiff first informed defendant of his claim under the agreement in suit, provided they believed that the agreement was made, and the demand was presented to the administrator in time. Clark v. Cordry, 69 Mo. A. 6. (2) Where an administrator of an assignor is made a party to answer as to the assignment of the note sued on, an instruction that if the jury returned a general verdict for plaintiff on the note sued on, the effect would be a finding that the estate had no interest in such note is not erroneous. [a] Thus, (1) in an action by an executor on a sealed instrument merely produced by plaintiff, a statement in the instructions that such paper "was found among the belongings of" the testator was unwarranted by the evidence and erroneous. Fullam v. Rose, 181 Pa. 138, 37 A 197. (2) Where the evidence shows that bonds received by a legatee from the executor were received as bonds, a charge directing the jury to determine whether they were accepted as "good money" is error. Dillard v. Ellington, 57 Ga. 567.

O'Connell, 218 Mass. 105, 105 NE 629 (where plaintiff, in an action for the value of services rendered to defendant's intestate, testified that deceased promised to pay him for his services in part by free rent and in part by leaving him a legacy, his evidence that no price for the services was agreed on and that while he was performing the work for her she had said he "won't lose anything by it" does not raise the issue, so as to call for an instruction thereon, of what she said as to a legacy being that she would leave him one by way of a gratuity, and not as part of the contract for services).

17. O'Connor v. O'Connor, 52 Ill. 316 (an instruction implying that the fact of an unexplained three-years' delay in presenting a claim against an estate need not be considered by the jury is erroneous and ground for reversal of a judgment allowing the claim). involving a claim of payment,[24] and an action by the personal representative for services rendered by decedent.[25] The representative cannot complain of error in an instruction given pursuant to his request.[26]

[§ 2193] 5. Verdict or Findings—a. In General. The verdict or findings should correspond to the issues involved or submitted,[27] although a general verdict is not defective for failing to dispose of issues submitted, which by reason of rulings of the court were practically excluded;[28] and such a verdict on several counts may be amended within a reasonable time so as to apply to the count under which evidence is given.[29] Where the facts show presentation of a claim, a recovery in an action thereon is not precluded by findings that the claim was never presented to the administrator or allowed by him or filed in the probate court.[30] Findings that services performed for decedent were to be paid for "after she was through with her property" and that such payment was not to be made by request in her will are neither literally nor positively inconsistent.[31] In an action on a note signed by defendant's intestate and an open account for goods sold to intestate a verdict against defendant is against him in his representative capacity, although it does not contain descriptive words showing this fact.[32]

[§ 2194] b. On Issue of Plene Administravit or No Assets. Upon the issue of plene administravit or no assets, a verdict for plaintiff should find not only the amount of plaintiff's claim, but also the amount of assets in the hands of the representative, otherwise the court cannot render a judgment upon the verdict.[33] Where, however, the unadministered assets exceed the amount of plaintiff's claim, it is usual to find not the whole amount of such assets but only a sum sufficient to cover what is due to plaintiff.[34] It has been said that on a plea of no assets the practice is for the jury to find for defendant and where the representative does not plead plene administravit it is error to instruct that, as the pleading showed that the representative had property of decedent in his hands at the time a judgment on which he is sued was recovered, he could only relieve himself by showing that he had expended it on prior liens, funeral expenses, and judgments, and to fail to charge that he would not be liable if he had judgments in favor of the estate, but was unable to collect the same).

24. Morrow v. Duggan, 176 Ill. A. 415 (on a claim for material and labor used in constructing buildings on a farm, where there is a set-off for rent, an instruction to the effect that proof that plaintiff used and occupied the farm cast upon him the burden of showing payment for such use and occupation, and that the law does not require him to show payment by direct evidence, but that it is sufficient if the jury believe from the evidence, facts, and circumstances that such payment was made, is not erroneous where there is testimony that rent was paid).

Haub v. Leggett, 160 Cal. 491, 117 P 556. (2) A finding that decedent did not promise to pay for services performed is not outside the issues, where the complaint alleges that decedent promised to pay for such services, and the answer denies the promise. Watson v. Miller, (Cal.) 58 P 135. (3) A finding that on a certain day letters of administration of intestate's estate were issued by a certain court to "plaintiff herein, that said letters have not since been revoked," is sufficient on the issue that an order of such court was duly given, made, and entered, appointing plaintiff administrator of such estate. Curran v. Kennedy, 89 Cal. 98, 26 P 641. (4) A finding, in an action by an administrator to recover money deposited by decedent in defendant bank, that the decedent opened an account in his own name in the bank and thereafter made deposits on and drew from such account, and while such account remained with defendant bank deceased, in the presence of this son, caused the bank to change the deposit to the names of himself and his son, as "joint owners, payable to either or survivor," and that decedent thereby agreed with the bank that the account could be paid by the bank either to himself or his son during his lifetime and after his death could be paid to the son does not support a conclusion that the deposit was the property of decedent, and continued to be his property after such agreement, and at all times until his death. Carr v. Carr, 15 Cal. A. 480, 115 P 261. (5) The omission to find the amount of assets in the representative's hands is no objection to a verdict for defendant in a suit against him by decedent and revived by his representatives, in which defendant had filed a set-off for more than the decedent's demand. Adams v. Evans, 4 Blackf. (Ind.) 247. (6) A verdict need not find the value of the estate devised, where, in an action against the executor and heir and devisees, the issue and verdict taken together constitute a finding of estate devised more than sufficient to pay the debt sued for. Jameson v. Martin, 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 330. (7) A finding of fact in an action by an administrator with the will annexed that testator's executor paid to defendant's intestate one thousand dollars for alleged professional services, where it does not appear that there was any fraud or bad faith in procuring such payment, or that the estate was not liable for professional services in a greater amount, is not sufficient to sustain a judgment for one thousand dollars, where the defense was that the money in question was paid to defendant's intestate for professional services and the return of such money was never demanded by plaintiff. Davis v. Olmsted, 800 N. Y. 557, 93 NE 473 [mod 128 App. Div. 915, 112 NYS 1126]. (8) Where, under an issue as to assets, plaintiff, suing an administrator, offered evidence of a devastavit, causing a failure of assets, the jury must find assets to the amount of the failure, and not find a devastavit. Shannon v. Dinkins, 33 S. C. L. 196. (9) A finding that defendant is indebted to plaintiff instead of that the "defendant detains from the plaintiff as administrator," etc., is sufficient. Glass v. Stovall, 10 Humphr. (Tenn.) 453.

fendant, and for plaintiff to pray judgment de terris, etc., and of assets quando acciderint.[35]

[§ 2195] R. Dismissal and Nonsuit.[36] A nonsuit or dismissal of an action by or against an executor or administrator may be granted under proper circumstances,[37] as for want of the proof required by statute,[38] or where plaintiff suing the representative has admitted that he had funds belonging to decedent in his possession but refuses to disclose the amount thereof;[39] or where the action was improperly instituted,[40] or there is a misjoinder of parties;[41] or where the record does not show that defendant was liable to be sued.[42] A dismissal may be without prejudice to the right to bring another action[43] or on the merits,[44] as the circumstances of the case require. Where the statute provides that plaintiff, suing an executor or administrator, shall, on motion, be nonsuited if he fails to produce an affidavit that the sum demanded is justly and truly due and that there are no credits save as mentioned, the necessary affidavit may be produced on defendant's motion for a nonsuit after plaintiff has closed his case.[45] A legatee who has filed a bill against the executor and other legatees for his share cannot, after an interlocutory decree establishing his right, voluntarily dismiss his bill to the prejudice of the legatees who are benefited by the decree.[46] If one item of an account against a decedent's estate is properly proved in an action thereon, it is error to dismiss the entire claim.[47]

A voluntary dismissal as to one of two corepresentatives who is the active representative of the estate is a dismissal as to both.[48]

[§ 2196] S. New Trial.[49] On suitable grounds a new trial is sometimes granted in actions by or against an executor or administrator,[50] but in an action against executors for the funeral expenses of the testator, it is not ground for a new trial that the amount of the verdict embraced an item not included in plaintiff's statement, the item being connected with the transaction, and needed to make up the aggregate claim.[51]

Weir v. Mosher, 19 Wis. 311. (2) A petition to the county court to have the executor of one bound by contract to convey real estate, but dying before making the conveyance, decreed to make the conveyance, is properly dismissed without prejudice to petitioner's right to proceed in the circuit court, under Rev. Prob. Code § 259, providing therefor where on the hearing the right of petitioner to have specific performance is found to be doubtful, it appearing that the contract price was only a third of the value of the property at the time of the hearing, that only a third of the contract price was paid when the contract was made, and that, although the contract, which was not recorded until nine years after its exeution, provided that on payment of the balance of the purchase money, evidenced by the purchaser's note payable five years after date, and payment of taxes, or on execution and tender of a mortgage securing the balance of the purchase money, the vendor would give a deed, no payment of the note or taxes or tender of the same or of a mortgage was made during the life of the vendor, who died four years after the note was due, and no reasons excusing such failure to make payment or tender being disclosed. 51. Smith v. Teacle, 8 Pa. Co. 150.

[§ 2197] T. Judgment[52]—1. Rendition, Form,[53] and Requisites—a. In General. A decree in form against the estate of a decedent, instead of against his personal representative as such, although irregular, is not erroneous.[54] Erroneous directions in a judgment for a pro rata payment of the claim sued on do not necessarily vitiate the judgment, but may be rejected as surplusage.[55] On a bill by a distributee against an administrator for his distributive share a decree which directs complainant's share to be paid to him without taking notice of the shares of other distributees is erroneous.[56] In some states certain demands against an estate cannot be prosecuted to judgment before the expiration of a certain time from the granting of letters testamentary or letters of administration,[57] and under some conditions no money judgment can be rendered against a personal representative.[58] Where part of the claim sued on has been allowed, but the verdict is for defendant, judgment should be entered in favor of plaintiff for the amount allowed, but plaintiff should be taxed with costs.[59] In an action against an executor to recover money that testator had received as guardian of plaintiff, a judgment ordering a sale of land to pay the claim is erroneous.[60] In a suit against an administrator to enforce a debt, however, a decree declaring certain property to be assets of the estate should also direct a sale thereof to discharge the debt.[61] The rendition of judgment against the representative, although the demand in suit is not due at the time of trial, is sometimes authorized by statute.[62] Where, in an action for rent against the executor of a deceased lessee and the surviving lessee, the latter was not served with process and did not appear, and there was no evidence that the executors and the surviving lessee had any joint property in the estate, and the executor did not serve a cross complaint on the surviving lessee for the adjustment of their rights, and there was nothing to indicate whether the surviving lessee was within the jurisdiction of the court, a judgment against the executor only is not objectionable, although the statute authorizes a judgment against all defendants jointly indebted, so far only as it may be enforced against the joint property of all and the separate property of defendants served.[63] A loan by a father to a son subsequent to the execution by the father of his will, which is evidenced by a receipt reciting that repayment is to be made out of the estate, is to be charged in equity upon the real estate devised to such son by the will, and an executor is not entitled to a personal judgment against such son in an action to recover such loan.[64] In an action on a note signed by defendant personally and by decedent, whose administrator defendant is, a judgment against him personally providing for satisfaction out of property jointly owned by defendant personally and as administrator was not void, the provision giving it no added force.[65]

The amount of the judgment depends of course on the peculiar circumstances of the particular case.[66] Under proper circumstances interest may be

Jewett, 11 Iowa 276 (although in a suit on a claim against an administrator the court has simply to allow or disallow the claim, without fixing the per cent to be paid thereon, except in cases where the assets are determined and the several claims ascertained as contemplated in the code, yet the judgment for pro rata payment is not void).

[c] Judgment inoperative until expiration of statutory period.—A statute declaring that a judgment against an executor or administrator by confession or default within six months after his qualification shall be "void" is intended only to prevent favoritism on the part of the personal representative by which a preference might be given some creditors over others, and the word "void" is not used absolutely but means merely that the judgment shall be inoperative for the time limited, so that no such advantage shall be taken. [b] Successful plea of set-off.—Where both parties are executors or administrators, suing and sued in their representative capacity, and defendant pleads payment with notice of a set-off exceeding in amount plaintiff's claim, judgment cannot be entered up against plaintiff for the balance, but it nevertheless becomes a debt of record, to be enforced by an action of debt or a scire facias. [c] Cancellation of receipts.—Where the petition against an administratrix for the cancellation of receipts alleged to have been fraudulently obtained and for the payment of plaintiff's claim fails to allege any settlement of the estate by the administratrix and the balance found due plaintiff, no money judgment can be rendered. Maney v. Casserly, 134 Mich. 252, 96 NW 478. (2) A decree should not be rendered against an administrator for the whole of the trust fund in his hands at the suit of a single legatee, but only for a sufficient amount to pay complainant. Tatum v. McLellan, 56 Miss. 352. (3) In an action by a distributee to recover his distributive share of his administrators, judgment cannot be rendered also to include plaintiff's distributive share in the distributive share of the widow of intestate, who has since deceased, although the same dis-

Classifying claim. It has been held that the court in which an action against an executor or administrator is brought has power to classify the claim in suit, and order it to be paid as a claim of the class to which it belongs,[68] but this has also been denied.[69]

In an action for damages to property, a judgment against a tort-feasor's executor should be several and not jointly with his codefendant.[70]

[§ 2198] b. Judgment by Confession or Consent. The personal representative of a decedent may confess judgment both at law and in equity,[71] but it has been considered that the statement of indebtedness relied on as a basis of a confession of judgment must be clear and unequivocal.[72] Where, on a bill by decedent's widow and two infant children against the administrator, a decree is entered by consent that the administrator is indebted to the estate in a certain sum, and that of this sum one third belongs to the widow and two thirds to the infant children, the decree is not erroneous in failing to require refunding bonds to be given by plaintiffs, since this would be incompatible with the evident intent and legal effect of the decree.[73]

[§ 2200] d. Judgment for Payment in Due Course of Administration. Where a judgment establishes a claim against the estate, the creditor should be remitted to the probate court for satisfaction,[76] and hence the general rule is that such a judgment should not be in the form of a general money judgment against the representative, but should direct that payment be made in due course of administration,[77] although entry of judgment in tributees are entitled to such share of the widow in the same proportion. Wier v. Lum, 5 N. J. L. 823. (4) An executor and a legatee who have misappropriated the estate are liable for no more than is proved to have remained in the hands of the executor and to have been received by the legatee beyond what he was entitled to; and that a judgment against them transcending this liability, without showing in what manner or upon what evidence it is done, so that its modification is impracticable, will be reversed. Hayward v. Place, 4 Silv. Sup. 390, 7 NYS 523. (5) Where in a suit by an administrator to recover money, in which defendants pleaded offsets for boarding, etc., and for advancements to heirs, it was undisputed that defendants received six hundred and fifty dollars belonging to decedent, and only fifty dollars was shown to have been paid on decedent's behalf, a judgment for plaintiff for fourteen dollars was inadequate. Manchester v. Bursey, 48 Tex. Civ. A. 633, 107 SW 557. (6) Where a guardian de facto is dead, in a proceeding by the wards against his administrator, it is not error to decree the whole amount due them for rents and profits against the administrator, although the deceased guardian's land, including the land of such wards, had been partitioned among his heirs, and one of them in particular held the wards' shares since his coheirs would have to contribute to his compensation, and such a decree avoids circuity of action. Martin v. Fielder, 82 Va. 455, 4 SE 603.

[b] Attorney's fees.—Where certain notes, filed as a claim against intestate's estate, provided for ten per cent of principal and interest unpaid as an attorney's fee, if the notes were placed in the hands of an attorney for collection, and the notes, with the deed of trust securing them, having been twice presented to the maker's administrator, were rejected in toto, the holders, having previously placed them in the hands of an attorney for collection, were entitled to recover ten per cent for attorney's fees, without proving affirmatively that they had agreed to pay such amount for attorney's fees, or that such sum was reasonable. Lawrence, 7 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 206, 208. (2) "The suit ties up the hands of the administrator or executor, who cannot accelerate the proceedings in it, nor can the creditors of the intestate generally, who are interested in the administration going forward, do anything to advance it. Courts therefore allow of the confession of a judgment to relieve the executor or administrator from a situation embarrassing to him and injurious to the creditors." Lawrence v. Bush, 3 Wend. (N. "It is further contended that the judgment is erroneous as to form, in view of § 1483 of Remington Ballinger's A. Code, which provides: 'The effect of any judgment rendered against any executor or administrator shall be only to establish the claim in the same manner as if it had been allowed by the executor or administrator and the court; and the judgment shall be, that the executor or administrator pay, in due course of administration, the amount ascertained to be due, but no execution shall issue upon such judgment, nor shall it create a lien upon the property of the estate, or give the judgment creditor any priority of payment.' It is true this section seems to contemplate that the judgment should contain the direction as to the manner of its payment by the administrator. In this case the judgment was in usual form, but without any such direction. It is clear from the provisions of this section what the effect of such a judgment is and how it shall be paid by the administrator, and since in this case it is against the administrator as such, its force and effect is easily understood, though it may not contain words directing its manner of payment as provided by this section. We think, however, it is a better practice to use the words of the statute in a judgment against an administrator, and therefore direct that the judgment against the administrator be amended by inserting the words of the statute directing the manner of its payment." Spokane v. Costello, supra.

"A judgment de bonis testatoris is a proper judgment in all cases where the executor is a party and the estate of decedent is liable for the debt." Bogue v. Laughlin, 149 Wis. 271, 286, 136 NW 606, 40 LRANS 927, AnnCas1913C 1367 [cit Cyc].

[a] "The meaning of a judgment de bonis testatoris is, that the plaintiff recover his debt or damages, to be levied of the goods and chattels of the testator in the hands of the executor; and it is so expressed, where the record is made up at length." Moore v. Kerr, 10 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 348, 349.

[b] Form of judgment.—At common law the judgment de bonis testatoris is rendered "that the said

resentative de bonis propriis in such an action is improper.[81] The same rule obtains where the action is brought by the executor or administrator but results in a judgment in favor of defendant.[82]

Construction of judgment. It has been held that if a suit is instituted and progresses against defendant as executor or administrator and the judgment is against "said defendant," it is a judgment de bonis testatoris or intestati;[83] but other authorities hold that such a judgment binds the representative individually.[84] It has been held that a judgment against a person designated administrator of the estate of a named decedent,[85] or against a person "as administrator"[86] is not a personal judgment, but a judgment against him in his representative capacity only, to be paid out of the assets of the estate; but, on the other hand, a judgment against an executor or administrator has been held to bind him personally, although he was therein designated executor or administrator,[87] although it followed a writ and declaration against him "as administrator,"[88] or even though it was rendered against him "in his capacity of administrator."[89] In order to ascertain whether a judgment against an administrator was intended to bind him de bonis propriis, or only de bonis testatoris, reference may be had to the pleadings in the case.[90]

[§ 2202] f. Judgment Quando Acciderint. A judgment against an executor or administrator should provide for its satisfaction out of the estate to the extent that assets may be found in defendant's hands, and as to the balance out of assets which may subsequently come into his hands.[91] If a plea of plene administravit is confessed by plaintiff or found in defendant's favor, plaintiff, on establishing his claim, is entitled to a judgment quando acciderint for the full amount thereof.[92] So also on a plea of no assets plaintiff may pray

John recover against the said Jane, executrix, as aforesaid, —— pounds, etc., to be levied of the goods and chattels which were of the said J. D., deceased, at the time of his death, in the hands of said Jane, to be administered." Keniston v. Little, 30 N. H. 318, 64 AmD 297.

[c] In an action against an administrator on an order directing payment of a claim judgment should be rendered for only so much as the assets will warrant, since the order should direct payment only to the extent of the assets. Peckham v. Hoag, 57 Mich. 289, 23 NW 818.

[d] Judgment in foreign attachment.—As a general rule a judgment against an administrator on a debt due from the intestate's estate should be against the estate, and the same rule prevails in a process of foreign attachment against an administrator. Quigg v. Kittredge, 18 N. H. 137.

[e] Judgment by default.—Judgment in favor of a creditor of the intestate against an administrator who enters no appearance and makes no plea should be de bonis testatoris. Jennings v. Wright, 54 Ga. 537.

[f] Judgment by confession.—Where executors are sued as "J's executors," without naming them, and they confess judgment generally, the judgment binds the estate only, and not themselves personally. Jones v. Gardner, 4 Watts (Pa.) 416.

[g] Judgment for funeral expenses.—Under a statute placing funeral expenses among debts to be first paid out of the estate, and providing that an action for them may be brought against an executor, even within the six months which is generally allowed him to examine into the condition of the estate, judgment may be entered de bonis testatoris. Campfield v. Ely, 13 N. J. L. 150.

[h] Judgment in action revived against administrator.—Where a defendant dies, and the suit is revived against his administrator, the decree against him should be de bonis intestati only. Myers v. Mott, 29 Cal. 359, 89 AmD 49; Hunt v. Martin, 8 Gratt. (49 Va.) 578; Cocke v. Gilpin, 1 Rob. (40 Va.) 20. But compare Greenlee v. Bailey, 9 Leigh (36 Va.) 526 [foll Catlett v. Russell, 6 Leigh (33 Va.) 344] (personal judgment proper in detinue action).

[i] Individual appearance.—Where decedent received property under a will providing that at his death it should go to other heirs of testatrix in an action against his executrix to recover the property, she could only be compelled to account as executrix, plaintiff being not entitled to a personal judgment against her, although she appeared individually and the court acquired jurisdiction over her. Volhard v. Volhard, 119 App. Div. 266, 104 NYS 578.

[j] Judgment on plea of plene administravit.—(1) On a verdict against an executor on a plea of plene administravit the judgment should be de bonis testatoris. Sigiar v. Haywood, 8 Wheat. (U. S.) 675, 5 L. ed. 713; Jameson v. Martin, 3 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 330. (2) Where the estate is solvent, including real estate, and the administrators neglect to apply for a sale of the real estate, and pay out all the personal estate to one creditor to the exclusion of the rest, it is a devastavit, and the judgment must be de bonis testatoris, notwithstanding the plea of plene administravit, which is an immaterial plea. Abbott v. Cole, 5 Oh. 86.

[k] Necessity of fixing executor with assets.—(1) A decree cannot properly be made against an executor for a debt of his testator until he has, by confession or the report of a master, been fixed with assets. Moody v. Sitton, 37 N. C. 382. (2) If, however, an administrator does not plead want of assets, the judgment of de bonis testatoris is awarded. Hogg v. White, 2 N. C. 298; Parker v. Stephens, 2 N. C. 218, 1 AmD 557. (3) So in suits against executors it is not regular to enter a decree to be levied on the goods of the testator, without an account. McRae v. Bates, 4 Hen. & M. (14 Va.) 490. (4) If, however, plaintiff's claim is proved or admitted, and the executor confesses assets, plaintiff may, at the hearing, have a decree for payment without taking a decree for an account. Duerson v. Alsop, 27 Gratt. (68 Va.) 229.

[l] Necessity of direction as to payment out of assets.—(1) A judgment against an administrator as such is sufficient, if the recitals therein show that it was rendered against him in his representative capacity, although there is no express direction that the money is to be levied of the goods and chattels of his intestate in his hands to be administered. Cake v. Woodbury, 3 App. (D. C.) 60; Guice v. Sellers, 43 Miss. 52, 5 AmR 476. Contra Thorn v. State, 10 Tex. 295; Hite v. Paul, 2 Munf. (16 Va.) 154. (2) A judgment against an executor or administrator, where there is no plea that the sum recovered "be levied of the goods and chattels, lands and tenements, of the testator or intestate," is sufficient, on an affidavit of illegality interposed to the execution, without adding the words, "in the hands of," etc., "to be administered." Woolfolk v. Kyle, 48 Ga. 419.

[m] Limitation as to judgment binding assets.—In no case can a judgment be rendered against an administrator, to be levied on the assets of the estate, except where it directs a sale of specified articles thereof. Johnson v. Meier, 62 Ind. 98.

judgment of assets when they shall come into the hands of the administrator.[93] If a judgment against a personal representative is presented for payment within the time prescribed by statute, it is to be satisfied out of the estate then inventoried;[94] otherwise it is to be satisfied out of subsequently inventoried assets.[95] A judgment quando acciderint is sometimes authorized on a claim which is barred, as against general assets, because of nonpresentation.[96]

Effect as admission of no assets. It has been held that a judgment quando acciderint amounts to an admission by plaintiff that defendant had no assets at its date,[97] but plaintiff may require an accounting of prior assets where they were fraudulently misappropriated and the fraud was not discovered until after the entry of the judgment quando acciderint.[98]

Effect on priorities. A judgment quando acciderint does not alter the common-law priority between debts, so as to give one of inferior dignity, on which such a judgment has been taken, a preference before a debt of higher dignity not sued on.[99]

"It is further claimed that the court erred in entering a personal judgment against the appellant. Under the statute (section 3862, Rev. St. 1898, a judgment against an executor or administrator upon any claim for money against the estate of a deceased person only establishes the claim in the same manner as if it had been allowed by the executor or administrator and the judge, and the judgment must be that the executor or administrator pay in due course of administration the amount ascertained to be due and that no execution must issue upon such judgment nor shall it create any lien upon the property of the estate or give to the judgment creditor any priority of payment. The judgment as entered was not in compliance with the statute, and for that reason was erroneous." Smith v. Hanson, 34 Utah 171, 180, 96 P 1087, 18 LRANS 520; Clayton v. Dinwoodey, 33 Utah 251, 93 P 723, 14 AnnCas 926.

[a] Where administrators are garnishees, it is error to enter judgment against them de bonis propriis. Lorenz v. King, 38 Pa. 93.

[b] While a legacy or distributive share may be reached in the executor's hands by attachment execution, only the orphans' court can determine the amount due on the settlement of the estate, and hence judgment should not be rendered in the common pleas for a sum certain against the executor de bonis propriis. Maurer v. Kerper, 102 Pa. 444.

[c] Possession by executrix of administrator.—The fact that an administrator died testate, and that his executrix took possession of the estate in process of administration, does not authorize a judgment de bonis propriis, against the executrix. Keowne v. Love, 65 Tex. 152.

[d] Foreclosure of heir.—Although the statute provides that an administrator may be sued to foreclose a lien, it is error to enter a personal judgment against an administrator in an action to foreclose a lien. Viles v. Green, 91 Wis. 217, 64 NW 856.

[e] Judgment by default.—(1) Judgment de bonis propriis by default is erroneous, under a statute providing that administrators shall not, as at common law, be liable personally on failure to plead. Phillips v. Munsell, 5 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 253; Rece v. May, 2 A. K. Marsh. (Ky.) 23; Senescal v. Bolton, 7 N. M. 351, 34 P 446. (2) Where an action of replevin is against an executrix in her representative capacity, a default judgment for the value of the property, rendered against her personally, is irregular, if not void, and may be set aside on application therefor within the statutory period. White v. McFarland, 148 Mo. A. 338, 128 SW 23.

[f] On plea of plene administravit.—In an action against an executor upon a contract of his testator, where devastavit is not alleged and proved, a judgment de bonis propriis is erroneous. "Unless an administrator or executor in such a case pleads a false plea, he is not liable to a judgment beyond the assets in his hands to be administered; and it is well settled that a plea of plene administravit is not necessarily a false plea, and that the judgment in such a case, even if the plea is not sustained, should be a judgment de bonis testatoris." Smith v. Chapman, 93 U. S. 41, 23 L. ed. 795 [foll Siglar v. Haywood, 8 Wheat. (U. S.) 675, 5 L. ed. 713].

[g] Partial invalidity. — A joint judgment on a note against the administrator of a deceased maker and the surviving makers is erroneous as to the administrator, if it is not made payable de bonis testatoris; but this error does not invalidate it as to the other defendants. Stockton Bank v. Howard, 42 Cal. 129.

[h] Action against nonresident executor sued by publication. — Where a nonresident executor of a foreign estate was sued for commissions for the sale of lands in Kansas belonging to the estate, which lands were attached and service had on the executor by publication, who answered defending for the estate, the court had no jurisdiction to render judgment against the executor individually, although he may have in-

should be rendered against him de bonis testatoris [2] to be paid in due course of administration.[3] In a creditors' suit to enforce claims against an estate, where an accepted order by an executor is rejected as against the estate, the creditor is not entitled to a decree against the executor personally.[4]

A judgment de bonis propriis is proper where the representative is personally liable on the claim in suit,[5] as where the action is upon a promise made or obligation incurred by the representative after the death of decedent.[6] It has also been considered that a personal judgment de bonis propriis may be rendered against an executor or administrator where he has been guilty of a violation of duty in the administration of the estate committed to his charge,[7] as by committing a devastavit;[8] where the action is for a legacy in the hands of the executor;[9] where there has been a decree of the probate court requiring the representative to make payment, and nothing remains to be done but to pay the money;[10] or where the representative has made a false plea in the action.[11] Where an executor or administrator sues on a cause of action alleged to have accrued after the death of a decedent, and upon which the representative might, therefore, have sued in his own right, judgment de bonis propriis may be entered against him in case defendant succeeds.[12] In equity a decree against an administrator having assets, or acknowledging assets, should be de bonis propriis.[13] A personal decree against executors de son tort is proper where they jointly converted certain notes which were not returned as assets of the estate, and they cannot contend that these notes are assets to be collected only by an administrator to be appointed.[14] Where an administrator of a defendant in detinue, who dies pendente lite, consents that the case shall stand revived against him, and goes to trial on the plea put in by his intestate, the judgment against him should be personal for the property or its alternative value, while the costs and damages should be levied de bonis testatoris.[15]

Construction of judgment. Where objections to the return of appraisers setting aside a year's support on a widow's application therefor were filed, and the case was appealed to the superior court, where a verdict was returned in favor of the applicant, and a judgment was rendered: "The jury having returned a verdict in the above-stated case for $101.38, it is thereupon considered, ordered, and adjudged by the court that the plaintiff have and recover of the defendant, James Beall, Admr., etc., the sum of $101.38, principal, and $9.65, costs of suit," the judgment was in terms a judgment against defendant individually, and not binding on the assets of the administrator's decedent.[16]

[a] Who may take advantage of devastavit.—Where the assets are insufficient to pay all claims against the estate, plaintiff is not entitled to a judgment de propriis against the administrator on proof that the latter has paid demands inferior in dignity to that of plaintiff, if there exists outstanding and unpaid a claim of higher dignity than his, sufficient in amount to absorb the entire assets; for, although such payments constitute a devastavit for which the administrator is personally liable, such liability exists only in favor of a creditor injured by the making of such payments. Gwinn v. Trotter, 112 Ga. 703, 38 SE 49.

[b] Necessity for previous judgment de bonis testatoris.—"As to the $75 and the costs, the judgment is in effect to be levied de bonis propriis, and to that extent convicts the executor of a devastavit. To entitle the plaintiff to such a judgment, he must have obtained a previous judgment against the executor to be levied de bonis testatoris, and upon which execution had been returned nulla bona, as settled in Carroll v. Connet, 2 J. J. Marsh. 195, 208, and other cases. Without such judgment and return, no suit for a devastavit could be brought, unless authorized by the act of 1839, regulating the administration and settlement of estates; and neither the letter nor spirit of that act seems to contemplate any proceeding under it except in a Court of Equity. It gives no new remedy, nor does it change the mode of proceeding at law." Markham v. Allen, 8 B. Mon. (Ky.) 417, 418.

"If he plead ne unques executor, or a release to himself, and the issue be found against him, the judgment is, that execution issue in the first instance, de bonis testatoris si, et si non, de bonis propriis, for both debt and costs; and the reason is that he pleaded a plea which he knew to be false; and thus, unnecessarily delayed the plaintiff. The rule laid down in Lansing v. Lansing, 18 Johns. (N. Y.) 502, is right as to that case; but it is too broad, and should be accompanied with this qualification, that if the executor suffer judgment by default, or give a cognovit actionem, or plead any other plea but the two above named, and the issue be found against him, the judgment is de bonis testatoris si, for the whole debt or damages and costs, et si non, then de bonis propriis for the costs." [§ 2205] i. Judgment against Personal Representative and Heirs Jointly. A judgment against a personal representative and heirs jointly is to be satisfied first out of the assets in the hands of the executors if sufficient, and if not, then out of the assets descended to the heirs.[20]

[§ 2206] j. Action to Set Aside Fraudulent Conveyance. It has been held that in a suit by an executor to set aside an alleged fraudulent conveyance of testator's property because of the deficiency of assets to pay claims allowed against the estate, a decree requiring a reconveyance of such property to the executor and a sale thereof in the ordinary manner to pay debts is erroneous and should be modified, so as to require the grantee to pay claims allowed against the estate and costs of the proceedings in the probate and circuit courts within a reasonable time from the entry of the decree, and that the lands be sold only on his failure to do so.[21] A decree in equity, holding property fraudulently conveyed by decedent to be subject to payment of debts to be established by county court administration, should designate claimant and adjudge that his claim has been approved by the county court for a stated amount, that plaintiff suing has been appointed the personal representative and maintains the action for the benefit of said claimant, the facts concerning the transfer and the insolvency thereafter of the grantor and his estate, that the transfer was in fraud of creditors, the identity of the property conveyed, and the order in which it may be resorted to and applied, and that it is subject to the payment of the approved claim exhibited in the creditor's bill, with administration costs of its collection, and by interlocutory decree require and direct the property be held in status quo subject to the final determination of the debt in the course of administration, whenever it shall appear that the grantee in good faith desires to litigate in probate court the validity of the debt on which the claim is asserted.[22] Where the statutes authorize an administrator to recover for the benefit of creditors all real estate fraudulently conveyed by decedent, and provide that all real estate so recovered must be sold for the payment of debts in the same manner as if the decedent had died seized thereof, and the proceeds appropriated in payment of the debts in the same manner as other property in the hands of the administrator, and the remainder paid to the person from whom such property was recovered, a judgment in an action by an administrator to recover property fraudulently conveyed by decedent vests the title in him for the benefit of creditors, and a further provision that the property is free and clear of all claims of the grantee, or any other person claiming through or under him, should be stricken out.[23] Where one of the defendants was appointed administrator of complainant's deceased wife, and as such was in possession of her personal estate at the time when complainant sued to set aside a deed to certain lands made by him after his wife's death to defendants, who were his brothers-in-law, and to recover such personal property, it was error for the court on setting aside the conveyance also to require the administrator to surrender the personal property to complainant.[24] In a suit in equity by an administrator to recover assets transferred by decedent to defendant, the court on sustaining the assignment has jurisdiction to decree the title in defendant and direct a delivery of the property to him under the transfer, instead of directing a transfer to the administrator for administration, there being no debts.[25]

[§ 2207] k. Action for Rescission of Contract. An action against an executrix to rescind a sale by decedent of live stock and for return of the purchase-money notes is an equity action, and the court has jurisdiction to determine all questions connected with the subject matter of the action, and the power, on decreeing rescission, to allow plaintiff's compensation for the keeping of the animals without a presentation of a claim therefor to the executrix.[26]

[§ 2208] l. Action Revived by Representative. Where an action is revived by the administrator who is also one of decedent's heirs, the money judgment should run in favor of the substituted plaintiff in his representative capacity.[27]

[§ 2209] m. Parties.[28] The judgment must specify with certainty the parties in whose favor it is rendered,[29] and where the complaint states a cause of action against defendant both individually and as administrator of a decedent, a judgment against defendant must designate the capacity in which he is bound.[30] The power of coadministrators is joint, and not joint and several, and there cannot be several judgments against them,[31] but it has been held that where after ascertaining the amount of assets in the hands of executors subject to distribution, the court rendered judgment against one of the executors in favor of some of the legatees and against the other in favor of the remaining legatees, such judgment, although irregular and voidable, was not void.[32] At common law judgment cannot be rendered on a joint obligation against surviving obligors and the representative of a deceased obligor.[33] Where the executor of a deceased tort-feasor is sued promptly in equity with the other tort-feasor, the decree should charge the executor severally, and not jointly with his codefendant, for the payment of damages.[34] Where heirs have the same interest in the personalty, which has not been distributed, as they have in the realty, which has been partitioned, a decree in a suit against the administrator and heirs on a debt of the ancestor may be rendered against the administrator alone, since payment of the debt out of the personalty will avoid litigation between the heirs for contribution.[35] No decree can be made against an administrator ad litem, where he is not obligated by bond or affidavit and has no power to bind anyone in interest.[36] The fact that one to whom letters of administration have issued has not duly qualified as administrator does not invalidate a judgment against him as such.[37] A plaintiff cannot object to a decree because it was rendered against him in the name and capacity in which he sued.[38] If a person sues and recovers as administrator, the judgment cannot be sustained as individual judgment.[39] Prima facie a judgment in favor of a person as executor or administrator is his individual property,[40] at least where it does not appear that he could not have recovered in his own right,[41] but the presumption may be overcome by evidence that he holds the judgment in trust.[42] Where the statute limits the liability of heirs to the extent of assets received, and in an action to establish a claim against decedent the creditor neither alleges nor proves that the heirs have received any part of his estate, the court is authorized only to render a judgment against the representative to be levied on the assets in his hands as such.[43]

Neale v. Hermanns, 65 Md. 474, 5 A 424. (2) The court cannot decree partition of land not designated in a bill against an administrator for distribution. Blackerby v. Holton, 5 Dana (Ky.) 520. (3) Judgment cannot be rendered against the land of a decedent in a proceeding in personam against the personal representative. McDowell v. Wright, 5 Ill. 403. (4) Where an action as for money had and received against an executor by a legatee, who received notes of the executor in payment of the legacy, is tried on the theory that defendant, while being an executor, became personally liable for the payment of the legacy, the judgment for plaintiff cannot be sustained on the theory that the action was on the notes, although the notes were offered in evidence, there being no count upon them. Camp v. Smith, 117 N. Y. 354, 22 NE 1044 [aff 49 Hun 100, 1 NYS 372]. (5) In an action against an administrator a decree for plaintiff cannot be made subject to the plea of plene administravit, when such plea has not been interposed. Quick v. Campbell, 44 S. C. 386, 22 SE 479. (6) Where, in an action to restrain the shutting off of water furnished to plaintiffs for irrigation through certain pipes, the answer alleged that the pipes belonged to an estate, of which P acted only as administratrix in furnishing water through them to plaintiffs, no judgment could be properly rendered against P personally, nor would the estate be bound by a judgment so erroneously rendered. Perrin v. Smith, 39 Colo. 404, 89 P 648. (7) Where a claim against an estate is already allowed, and entitled to be paid in due course of administration, a judgment for defendant for his claim in a suit brought in the district court for setting aside and annulling the allowance of the claim is unnecessary, and will be set aside on appeal, if defendant is not entitled to it on his pleadings. Lott v. Cloud, 23 Tex. 254. (8) Where a suit to recover funds of an estate unlawfully deposited with a stockbroker by a deceased executor was brought against the broker, and no claim is made against the estate of the deceased executor, but the personal representatives of such executor were brought in as parties, it was held that the court would not adjudicate the question of the right of contribution or to a recovery over as between such representative and plaintiff. Steele v. Leopold, 135 App. Div. 247, 120 NYS 569 [mod on other grounds 201 N. Y. 518, 94 NE 1099]. (9) A bill alleging the execution of a bond by a principal and sureties, the death of the principal and the sureties, and that the orator and oratrix are entitled to have the sum due collected and paid over, making the personal representatives, heirs, and distributees of the principal and of the sureties, parties defendant, specially praying that the personal estate of the principal and certain land covered by a deed of trust securing the debt be applied to the payment of the debt, and concluding with a prayer for general relief, confers upon the court jurisdiction to render a decree against the personal representatives of the sureties under the prayer for general relief. Turk v. Ritchie, 104 Va. 587, 52 SE 339.

[b] A judgment de bonis testatoris is supported by: (1) A declaration for money paid for the use of defendant as executor and at his request. Wakeman v. Paulmier, 39 N. J. L. 340. (2) A count for money paid by plaintiff after testator's death on a bond in which plaintiff was surety of testator. Cawley v. Reeve, 17 N. J. L. 415. (3) A count alleging an implied promise by an administratrix to refund the moneys expended for her use as such by paying a debt of intestate for which he and plaintiff were jointly liable. Collins v. Weiser, 12 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 97. (4) Where in an action against an executor plaintiff states testator's indebtedness, and that the executor, after the death of testator, in consideration, etc., promised to pay, the judgment will be de bonis testatoris and not de bonis propriis, the mode of declaring being merely to save proof,[45] verdict,[46] findings,[47] and report.[48]

[§ 2211] (2) Capacity in Which Representative Allowed to Recover or Held Bound. It has been held that if an executor or administrator sues as such, he cannot recover in his individual right;[49] but there are also cases in which an individual recovery by one who sued as executor or administrator has been regarded as permissible.[50] If a person sues individually, he cannot recover as executor or administrator.[51] If an action is brought against a person individually, judgment cannot be rendered against him as the personal representative of another.[52] As a general rule where one is sued as executor or administrator, no personal judgment can be rendered against him,[53] although there are cases in which it has been regarded as permissible limitations and not to prevent defendant from making any defense which he might have made had the declaration stated the promise of testator and his liability only. Whitaker v. Whitaker, 6 Johns. (N. Y.) 112.

[c] A judgment de bonis propriis (1) is authorized by a count alleging that goods were in possession of testator, and in effect averring that they came to the possession of defendants as executors and were converted by them. Schott v. Sage, 4 Phila. (Pa.) 87. (2) Where a declaration sets out as the cause of action a promise made by defendant as administrator, etc., the judgment must be de bonis propriis, and if rendered de bonis testatoris it will be reversed on error and the correct judgment rendered. Oliver v. Hearne, 4 Ala. 271; Vaughn v. Gardner, 7 B. Mon. (Ky.) 326. (3) A count in assumpsit by a legatee against an executor for a legacy which alleges a promise by defendant as executor to pay the legacy is a count against the executor in his representative capacity, upon which the judgment can only be de bonis testatoris. Kayser v. Disher, 9 Leigh (36 Va.) 357. (4) Where an executor obtained a judgment for a debt due his testator against the administrator of the debtor to be levied on the goods and chattels of the intestate, and afterward brought an action of debt against the administrator suggesting a devastavit, and declared in detinue only, he could not have a judgment de bonis propriis but only de bonis testatoris. Spotswood v. Price, 3 Hen. & M. (13 Va.) 123. (5) If the declaration contains a count founded on the promise of a testator, and also a count founded on an assumpsit by the executrix, it is error, under a general verdict, to render judgment against the executrix individually. Luke v. Marshall, 6 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 458. (6) The petition of the principal plaintiffs in an action in the district court alleged that their father, wrongfully assuming to act as independent executor of their mother, conveyed, without an order of court, a part of her separate estate, which in her lifetime she had mortgaged to secure a community indebtedness to defendant D for the purpose of defrauding plaintiffs; that D reconveyed to the executor, reserving the timber; that the conveyance to D was void because the executor was not an independent executor; that as a part of the consideration of the reconveyance the executor executed two vendor's lien notes which were a cloud on the title; that D, who was the owner and holder of the note secured by the mortgage given by testatrix, sold the timber on the land to others for a fair price, which was more than sufficient to discharge the mortgage. The evidence, however, showed a balance due on such mortgage. The prayer of the complaint was for an injunction restraining defendants from transferring any of the notes, claims, and judgment, to recover the land and timber, and cancel the deed to the land as a cloud upon plaintiff's title, and for a personal judgment against the executor. It was held that the prayer for a personal judgment against the executor on the ground that the amount received for the land and timber was applied to his personal debt in paying the mortgage on the land was not so incidental to the cancellation of the deed and removal of cloud from their title as to authorize the district court to enter a personal judgment against the executor. Berry v. Hindman, 61 Tex. Civ. A. 291, 129 SW 1181.

[d] Where incongruous counts requiring different judgments are joined in the same declaration, as when two counts in the narr. against them on their personal promise are joined with one on the promise of the testator, and there is a special finding on the last count, or no evidence on the first two, a judgment specially entered on the last is good. Bogle v. Kreitzer, 46 Pa. 465.

[e] On the other hand it has been held that where an administrator brings an action under Prob. Act. § 116 against one who has embezzled or alienated the personal property of the intestate between the death of the latter and the grant of letters of administration, but fails to bring the case within said section by his proof, so as to recover the enhanced damages therein given, he is still entitled to recover for a wrongful conversion as in the action of trover at common law. A. 480, 115 P 261 (a finding, in an action by an administrator to recover money deposited by deceased in defendant bank, that deceased opened an account in his own name in the bank and thereafter made deposits on and drew from such account, and while such account remained with defendant bank, deceased, in the presence of this son, caused the bank to change the deposit to the names of himself and his son, as "joint owners, payable to either or survivor," and that deceased thereby agreed with the bank that the account could be paid by the bank either to himself or his son during his lifetime and after his death could be paid to the son, does not support a conclusion that the deposit was the property of the deceased, and continued to be his property after such agreement, and at all times until his death).

White v. White, 69 Vt. 360, 37 A 1114.

[b] Foreclosure of mortgage.—On a bill against a living mortgagor and the administrator and heirs of a deceased mortgagor to foreclose a mortgage, no decree need be pronounced against the administrator if the pleadings, proofs, and report of the commissioner do not disclose any personal estate in the administrator's hands unadministered. Shields v. Simonton, 65 W. Va. 179, 63 SE 972.

[c] Report authorizing judgment de bonis testatoris.—Where an action was brought by an administrator, an account filed in set-off by defendant, and both submitted to a referee, who reported that defendant recover a certain sum as debt or damage, and costs, against plaintiff, instead of against the goods and estate of the intestate, and judgment was rendered by the court of common pleas on such report against the goods, etc., of the intestate, it was no error. [b] Descriptio personæ.—Where a person sued on a note payable to D or bearer, setting forth that he was the holder, but describing himself as "administrator of the estate of L, deceased," the quoted words were held to be descriptio personæ only, and in no way militating against his right to a judgment in his own name. Mason v. Lord, 20 Pick. (Mass.) 447. (2) Where plaintiff brings an action on a judgment, alleging that the judgment creditor had assigned it to plaintiff, "then the administrator de bonis non" of D's estate, the consideration being a note payable to plaintiff, surrendered by him to defendant, plaintiff is not entitled to judgment in his capacity as administrator, but may take judgment in his individual capacity. to render a personal judgment against one so sued [54] at least where the suit is brought in equity.[55]

Where one is sued both personally and as administrator, a judgment properly rendered against him individually will not be reversed because of failure of the court to render judgment against him as administrator, especially when no motion for such latter judgment has been made, nor any objection offered to entering the personal judgment against him.[56]

[§ 2213] p. Withholding Judgment for Lack of Parties. In a New York case it appeared that testator died in 1877, giving his daughter the income of two hundred thousand dollars during life, with remainder to her legal issue in equal proportion after they reached the age of twenty-one years. In an action to construe the will, in which all of the children of the daughter were parties, a judgment was rendered in 1880 determining that the term "legal issue," in the remainder clause of the will, meant such children of the daughter as should survive her. In an action against the daughter and a son, as administrators of the deceased father, for an accounting as to the fund and to have a trustee appointed, it appeared that two sons of the daughter had died intestate, without issue, leaving their father surviving them, and that one of the sons was also survived by his wife. It was held that the fact that the father and the surviving wife of the son, individually and as administratrix of the son, were not parties to the action, was no ground for withholding final judgment, they not being issue of testator's daughter.[59]

[§ 2214] 2. Entry and Transcript. The judgment entry must conform to the judgment as rendered.[60] The construction of an entry of judgment is a question for the court.[61] It is sometimes required that when a judgment is recovered against a personal representative as such, a transcript thereof shall be filed in the probate court.[62]

[§ 2215] 3. Amendment and Correction. Clerical errors in a judgment against the personal representative of a decedent may be corrected by amendment.[63] If through clerical error a judgment is entered against a person in another capacity than that in which he is sued, the defect may

[§ 2217] 5. Equitable Relief. In cases where no remedy at law exists,[82] a court of equity may, upon sufficient reasons for such action being shown, grant relief against the enforcement of a judgment at law in favor of [83] or against [84] an executor or administrator, where such relief is sought by a party in interest [85] within a reasonable time.[86] It is sufficient ground for the intervention of a court of equity that the judgment defendant, although having a good equitable defense to the claim, had no legal defense to the action at law,[87] or that, having a legal defense, he was unable for sufficient reason to present it,[88] as where he was afforded no opportunity to prove it.[89] In a proper case an executor or administrator may be relieved in equity from personal liability under a judgment at law, as where there are no assets or there is a deficiency of assets,[90] although in a number of instances equitable relief upon this ground has been denied.[91] Equity will not as a rule lend its aid to Mitchell v. Albright, 10 Oh. Dec. (Reprint) 301, 20 CincLBul 101. (4) An executor is not bound to plead the statute of limitations to a debt which he considers justly due, and the court will not set aside the judgment in such case to allow devisees to insist upon the statute. A. 345 (a petition against an administrator to set aside a judgment obtained by him against the estate alleging that plaintiffs were coheirs with defendant and that he procured the judgment upon a false and fraudulent account, concealing from plaintiffs all knowledge thereof until two and one-half years after the rendition of the judgment, sufficiently alleges the facts constituting the fraud).

[a] When equitable relief denied.—(1) The fact that an administrator to whom a note was due knew or connived at the purpose of the principal not to defend the suit, with the view that the surety, who depended on the principal to make defense, would thereby be misled and fail to appear, is not such an excuse for the failure to defend at law as will enable the surety to come into equity to enjoin the judgment. Walker v. Tyson, 52 Ala. 593. (2) Where one against whom a decree has been rendered in favor of an administrator for money due intestate is notified by the proper representatives that the administrator has ceased to be such and has no right to collect the money, his proper course, if he has good ground to believe that it would be unsafe to pay it over to the judgment plaintiff, is to file a bill in the nature of a bill of interpleader and bring the money into court, and he is not entitled to enjoin the judgment. Hendricks v. Mitchell, 37 Ga. 230. (2) Administrators will be relieved in equity against a judgment at law recovered on a debt, and a subsequent judgment against them personally in an action suggesting a devastavit, where the bill alleges that complainants never had any assets out of which they could properly pay the debt, and that the existence of several chancery suits prevented their pleading fully administered. Pendleton v. Stuart, 6 Munf. (20 Va.) 377. (3) Equity will afford relief against a personal judgment against an administrator on a charge of a devastavit, where it was rendered in the absence of his counsel, and the condition of the estate was so complicated as to make it nearly impracticable for the administrator to plead at law in relation to the assets. Pickett v. Stewart, 1 Rand. (22 Va.) 478. (4) An executor will be relieved in equity against judgments at law on the ground that assets which came to his hands sufficient to pay all the debts of the estate have since been recovered of him by a paramount title. [§ 2218] 6. Operation and Effect—a. In General. A judgment rendered against an executor or administrator in his representative capacity does not bind him personally,[95] but only the estate of decedent is bound thereby.[96] Conversely where the representative is sued in his individual capacity, a judgment against him does not bind the estate.[97] Where, in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien for materials supplied a contractor since deceased, the contractor's personal representative is made a defendant, the determination of the amount due the lien claimant is conclusive on the estate of the contractor.[98] A judgment confessed by one of two joint administrators is not binding on the other.[99] A judgment against an executor or administrator as such binds the personal property of the estate,[1] but not the realty.[2]

Wilson v. Bastable, 30 F. Cas. No. 17,788, 1 Cranch C. C. 304. (2) An administrator is not entitled to relief in equity against a judgment at law because he did not know that the assets were insufficient or that a judgment was evidence of assets. Page v. Haines, 56 Ga. 263. (3) After a judgment de bonis testatoris has been recovered at law against an administrator by default, and, on the return of nulla bona on an execution issued thereon, judgment is rendered against him by default de bonis propriis, equity will not relieve him. Bostwick v. Perkins, 1 Ga. 136. (4) Where an executor, on a miscalculation of assets in his hands, confesses judgment against himself for a debt of testator, in a suit in which it is alleged that he has assets sufficient to pay the claims, he will not be relieved in equity against the judgment, upon a showing that the assets are insufficient to satisfy it. Head v. Perry, 1 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 253.

[b] Administrator de bonis non.—A statute providing that scire facias, debt, and writ of error will lie either by or against an administrator de bonis non on a judgment for or against his predecessor, does not bring such administrator into privity with his predecessor, and therefore he cannot maintain a bill to review a judgment against his predecessor. [a] A judgment against the estate of a decedent does not bind the executor or administrator personally, although he may have omitted to plead. Conner v. Burd, 1 LegChron (Pa.) 17.

[b] Judgment held to be against estate and not against representative personally.—A suit for taxes resulting in a judgment for the city, was styled "City of G. against the Estate of B." B's executors were subsequently made parties. The judgment named the executors as executors, and they were so named in the order of sale. No personal judgment was rendered against them, but the lien was foreclosed on the property on which the taxes accrued, and the sheriff was directed to proceed against that property and no other, no judgment over against the executors being awarded in case the proceeds of sale should be insufficient. In a subsequent suit to set aside the judgment, the petition showed that the tax suit was brought against plaintiffs, defendants in the former suit, in their capacity as executors, and that the taxes were claimed against the estate. The order of sale of the property was also alleged to have been issued against them as executors, and the levy made on the property of the estate. It was held that a contention on appeal, in the suit to set aside the judgment, that the judgment and order of sale were against the executors personally, was without merit. Ross v. Drouilhet, 34 Tex. Civ. A. 327, 80 SW 241.

[c] Interest of representative in estate.—(1) If a bill for foreclosure makes a certain person defendant as executor and as guardian, and the return of process shows that he was served as executor and guardian, and the bill states that he has an individual interest in the mortgaged land, a decree of foreclosure binds him as well in his individual as in his representative capacity. Cornell v. Green, 43 Fed. 105 [app dism 163 U. S. 75, 16 SCt 969, 41 L. ed. 76]. (2) Where a widow possessed of a life estate in a moiety of the real property of her deceased husband, under authority from the orphans' court to mortgage the real estate of her intestate to raise funds for the payment of debts, procured the loan by executing to the lender a bond and warrant of attorney, upon which judgment was regularly entered, the judgment was held to bind the interest of the widow, although invalid against the rest of the estate. Barger v. Cassidy, 4 Phila. (Pa.) 324.

[d] Assets in possession at commencement of action.—Where judgments are obtained against an executor after service of a writ in another case and before plea, they make him responsible for the assets he had when served with the writ, although such judgments are entered up quando, the executor having sold the property of testator under the statute between the time of the service of the writ and the judgments quando. [a] A judgment against a special administrator appointed solely to enable the court to proceed in the cause binds the estate. Jordan v. Polk, 1 Sneed (Tenn.) 430.

[b] Both estate and representative individually bound.—Where a judgment is rendered for the payment of money against an individual in a case wherein he has answered, alleging that he holds the funds as administrator, the estate is bound by the judgment equally with defendant in his individual capacity. Ten Eick v. Dye, 9 Oh. Dec. (Reprint) 511, 14 CincLBul 214.

[c] A judgment recovered against administrators after they have resigned their trust is a nullity, not binding upon the estate or the administrator de bonis non. Buckingham v. Owen, 14 Miss. 502.

[d] A judgment against one who is not executor does not bind the estate, although it is rendered against him as executor. Griffith v. Frazier, 8 Cranch (U. S.) 9, 3 L. ed. 471.

97. Bostwick v. Brush, 4 NYSt 100.

[a] Judgment held to be against representative individually.—A judgment against one styled as executrix, without recovery to be had from goods and chattels in her hands to be administered, is not a judgment against the estate, but an individual judgment against the person so styled. Hall v. McGregor, 65 W. Va. 74, 64 SE 736.

ger and Bar of Causes of Action and Defenses. If judgment is rendered for or against an executor or administrator, the cause of action is merged, and no suit can subsequently be brought thereon,[3] and a judgment establishing a right of action precludes defendant therein from subsequently disputing it on any ground of defense that was or might properly have been urged in the action in which it was rendered.[4] A judgment negativing a right of action precludes the unsuccessful party from asserting it in a subsequent proceeding between the same parties,[5] but rights subsequently accruing are not barred.[6]

[a] Illustrations.—(1) A decree in chancery against an administrator in favor of one of the distributees for his share of a specific fund is conclusive as to any set-off on account of such distributee's appropriation of assets which might have been available to the administrator in defense of that suit, and which was in fact then adjudicated. Wright v. Phillips, 56 Ala. 69. (2) Where an execution was levied on slaves under a judgment against decedent's executor, one who interposed a claim by virtue of a trust executed by decedent during his life could not attack the validity of the judgment, but could only show that the property claimed was not subject to execution. Dent v. Smith, 15 Ala. 286. (3) Where an administrator has recovered and collected a judgment on a note given to the intestate, the maker of the note cannot subsequently sue to recover back the money on the ground that the debt had already been paid to the intestate, his failure to set up such defense in the action by the administrator being a conclusive bar to the subsequent action. Greenabaum v. Elliott, 60 Mo. 25. (4) Where, on a motion against a sheriff's administrator for the default of the sheriff's deputy, the executor of the deputy was notified to defend the motion, and promised to attend to it, but failed to do so, and judgment by default was rendered, the executor could not, in an action against him by the sheriff's administrator to recover the amount of the judgment, raise the objection that the statute of limitations would have been a defense to the motion. Scott v. Tankersley, 10 Leigh (37 Va.) 581.

[b] Contradiction of record.—Executors who plead plene administravit in a suit for their testator's debt cannot, when afterward sued individually on the judgment, show that no evidence was taken under the plea, and that the only question controverted at the trial was as to the validity of plaintiff's claim against testator. Crabb v. Young, 92 N. Y. 56. (2) Where the supreme court, on petition of the heirs of an estate, on the ground of fraud, accident, or mistake, orders an appeal from the decision of commissioners allowing a claim to be entered in the county court, which is accordingly done by the clerk, whereupon claimant files his declaration and proceeds to prosecute his suit from term to term, and finally suffers a nonsuit, he cannot afterward sustain an action against the administrator for the original allowance of the commissioners, although no record of an appeal appears in the probate court. Probate Ct. v. Rogers, 7 Vt. 198.

[b] Rule applies to compromise judgment.—Kerr v. Webb, 30 S. C. Eq. 369.

[c] The two causes of action must be the same else the judgment is not a bar. Sheldon v. Bradley, 37 Conn. 324 (where a conveyance by deed absolute in form was intended in part to secure a debt and in part to defraud creditors, the property exceeding in value the amount of the debt, and on a bill by the grantor's administrator against the grantee to set aside the conveyance a decree was entered declaring the deed to be valid and vesting the title absolutely in the grantee, it was conclusive as against the grantor's administrator as to the fraudulent character of the instrument, but did not estop him from claiming, in a suit subsequently brought to compel the grantee to account for moneys received from a sale of the premises, that the conveyance was intended as a mortgage); Buford v. Pawling, 5 Dana (Ky.) 283 (where a suit was brought against A as executor and revived against his executors, and judgment was rendered with an entry of an agreement that neither the executors of A nor his estate should in any event be liable on the judgment, it was a bar to a proceeding for a devastavit but not to a bill for a discovery of assets).

[d] Pleading.—In an action by an executor against an attorney to recover money belonging to the estate, which was received by the attorney and which he claims the right to appropriate in payment for services rendered by him for plaintiff's coexecutor, an answer alleging that theretofore, in proceedings before the surrogate to secure an order directing the payment of a sum of money to another attorney, it was represented to the surrogate that defendant attorney had collected and retained the sum sued for, but which does not allege that the surrogate approved the retention or acted on it in any way, is demurrable. [a] Necessity of actual determination.—Important matters which a decree does not profess on its face to dispose of, and upon which it fails to show any affirmative action by the court, it being apparent from the record that the court was not in condition to be heard as to those matters, will be presumed not to have been considered or embraced in the decree, and it is therefore not final and conclusive as to these matters. Shegogg v. Perkins, 34 Ark. 117.

[b] Judgment quando acciderint.—In an action against an administrator, a judgment quando acciderint is prima facie an adjudication that there are no debts known to the administrator which would take precedence of plaintiff's claim, and that assets subsequently coming into possession of the estate will be prima facie applicable to plaintiff's judgment. Willis v. Tozer, 44 S. C. 1, 21 SE 617.

[c] Title.—(1) A default confesses plaintiff's title as administraof kin, in a contest between him and another as to the grant of letters of administration, is not conclusive on the question of distribution.[8]

[§ 2221] (b) Representative Capacity. A judgment for or against an executor or administrator in his representative capacity establishes his character as such.[9]

[§ 2222] (c) Existence of Assets. At common law a judgment against an executor or administrator on a debt due from his decedent is a conclusive admission that he has assets on hand sufficient to pay it; and he cannot dispute this fact in a subsequent proceeding between him and the creditor.[10] The rule, however, is subject to some qualifications,[11] and in some states changed by statute.[12]

A judgment by confession is conclusive proof that the representative has assets sufficient to satisfy it,[13] but raises no estoppel in favor of a claimant other than the plaintiff in whose favor such judgment was confessed.[14]

A judgment by default is an admission of assets to the extent charged in the complaint,[15] but such admission does not operate in favor of a claimant other than plaintiff in such action.[16]

Where the representative fails to plead a want of assets or plene administravit or plene administravit præter, a judgment against him is conclusive as to the existence of assets.[17]

(2) Where, however, suit was brought by an administrator to recover moneys deposited in a savings bank in the name of defendant as trustee for plaintiff's intestate, and the surrogate passed an order deciding that the administrator by virtue of his office as such was entitled to the custody of the bank-book, this was not an adjudication of his title to the funds. Westervelt v. Westervelt, 46 N. Y. Super. 298. (3) A decree against an executor in a suit by heirs to compel him to inventory land to which he claimed title is not a conclusive adjudication of the title thereto in a subsequent suit by the heirs against the executor's heirs, after his death, to recover the property. [a] Illustrations.—(1) A decree of a court of equity that complainant recover a sum certain of an administrator and have execution of the goods and of the estate of the intestate in his hands to be administered, etc., is not alone sufficient evidence to establish a devastavit. Vick v. House, 3 Miss. 617. (2) A judgment against an executor or administrator by default on demurrer, or on any plea except one denying assets, does not preclude the executor or administrator from traversing an allegation, in an action on the judgment, that he has eloigned and wasted the assets of decedent. Howell v. Potts, 20 N. J. L. 569. (3) If judgment is entered against an executor de bonis non, execution to be levied on the lands of testator for a certain sum, it is to be considered as a judgment de terris, and is not evidence of devastavit against the executor, on a return of nulla bona and devastavit, where a levy has been made on lands and part payment received. Moore v. Kerr, 10 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 348. (4) A matter arising subsequent to the former discovery, showing a destruction of the assets or a removal of them from the hands of the executor or administrator without his fault, may be set up. Eq. 65, 6 AmD 597.

[b] Declaration not alleging assets.—Where an administrator suffers judgment to be rendered against him in an action wherein the declaration does not charge him with having received estate sufficient to pay the debt sued for, he does not thereby make such an admission of assets as will charge him personally. Judgment in favor of legatees or heirs. A judgment against an executor or administrator in favor of legatees or heirs may also be conclusive of the existence of assets in his hands.[18]

Statutory modification of rule. In a number of states the common-law rule by which a judgment against an executor or administrator is conclusive as to the existence of assets has been modified or abrogated by statutes, under which the judgment merely establishes the debt, leaving the question as to existence of assets undetermined,[19] unless the existence of assets was alleged in the complaint and the issue was thus determined.[20]

A creditor of an estate may be estopped by a judgment to assert the existence of assets.[21]

[§ 2223] (d) Indebtedness of Estate. A judgment against an executor or administrator as such establishes the amount and validity of the demand in suit, and it cannot be collaterally attacked on any ground that might have been urged in the suit in which it was rendered.[22]

[§ 2224] (3) Requisites of Judgment. In order to work an estoppel in favor of or against an executor or administrator, the judgment must be final[23] and the decision must, as a rule, have been made on the merits.[24] It is also necessary that the judgment should be valid,[25] and hence the rule does not apply where the judgment was secured by Tenn.—White v. Archbill, 2 Sneed 588.

Va.—Eppes v. Smith, 4 Munf. (18 Va.) 466.

"This doctrine, as is well known, is held in this state to the present day, except in relation to judgments obtained after the estate may have been declared insolvent, and it is of frequent occurrence, that executors or administrators are held liable, under such circumstances and on such evidence, in a second suit upon suggestion of a devastavit." Haines v. Price, 20 N. J. L. 480, 482.

"He was forever afterwards estopped, by this implied admission of assets, from pleading that he had fully administered." Martindale v. Moore, 3 Blackf. (Ind.) 275, 276.

[a] "The only exception to this rule is in cases where the administrator had no opportunity to plead, such as a judgment by motion, etc. Wray v. Williams, 2 Yerg. (Tenn.) 302; Dance v. McGregor, 5 Humphr. (Tenn.) 428; Williams v. Greer, 4 Hayw. (Tenn.) 235. In these cases he is allowed his plea of fully administered or no assets, to a sci. fa., or action of debt upon the judgment." White v. Archbill, 2 Sneed (Tenn.) 588, 595.

[b] Only prima facie evidence as against surety.—Where an administrator is sued on a debt of his intestate, and fails to plead a want of assets, a judgment against him in such suit is, as to a surety on his bond, merely prima facie evidence of a sufficiency of assets. [a] Rule applies to default judgment.—Chase v. Swain, 9 Cal. 130.

[b] Judgment for payment in course of administration.—A judgment of a circuit court against executors, requiring the claim to be paid in due course of administration, is binding on the county court to which it is certified by order of the circuit court, and the judgment of the latter court may also direct the classification of the claim. Darling v. McDonald, 101 Ill. 370.

[c] A judgment against the goods and estate of a deceased intestate in the hands of his administrator is conclusive evidence that he was indebted. Nowell v. Bragdon, 14 Me. 320.

[d] Defense of limitations.—A judgment against an executor or administrator on a debt of decedent cannot, in a proceeding to collect it, be attacked because the debt was barred by limitations, since that defense might have been interposed in the former action. West v. Smith, 8 How. (U. S.) 402, 12 L. ed. 1130; Thayer v. Hollis, 3 Metc. (Mass.) 369; Posthlewaite v. Ghiselin, 97 Mo. 420, 10 SW 482; Leroy v. Bayard, 3 Bradf. Surr. (N. Y.) 228.

[e] Report of auditor approved by court.—In an action against an administrator for money received by his intestate, the report of an auditor is prima facie evidence of the amount due on the principles and evidence stated in the report; and if approved by the court so much of the report may be read to the jury as shows a balance so stated, although before the jury are sworn defendant excepts to the evidence admitted by the auditor. U. S. Bank v. Williams, 2 F. Cas. No. 942, 3 Cranch C. C. 240.

23. Chaplin v. Jenkins, 21 S. C. Eq. 96 (where the litigation was for the adjustment of the claims of different legatees, and there was no default on the part of the executors, a decree adjusting those claims, but making no order as to costs, is not such a final decree fixing the executors with costs as may be opened only by petition for rehearing or by bill of review, but the costs may afterward be adjusted under an order of court on a rule taken for that purpose).

24. Robbins v. Wells, 1 Rob. (N. Y.) 666 (a judgment dismissing a supplemental complaint filed by the representative of a plaintiff who has died since the filing of the original complaint, given solely upon the ground that such representative has no legal capacity to sue, is not a bar to further proceedings by the proper representatives). See also Emmett v. Stedman, 3 N. C. 15 (where a judgment is erroneously entered against executors in an action wherein they pleaded non assumpsit and plene administravit, and the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff on the first plea but did not make any finding under the second, the executors may, on the issuance of a scire facias, again enter the plea of plene administravit; but to sustain such plea they must show a full administration and no assets at the time of the commencement of the original action).

25. Pickens v. Yarborough, 30 Ala. 408; Coffin v. Cottle, 9 Pick. (Mass.) 287.

[a] Insufficiency of proof.—The court having jurisdiction, a judgment fraud,[26] collusion,[27] or accident.[28] But an administrator is not relieved from personal liability on a judgment de bonis testatoris, rendered against him for his failure to plead a want of assets, by the fact that he did not know the real condition of the estate, when by the exercise of due diligence he might have known it.[29] A judgment which has been reversed works no estoppel.[30]

[§ 2225] (4) Persons Estopped and Entitled to Urge Estoppel—(a) In General. A judgment concerning a decedent's estate works an estoppel between the parties to the suit and their privies,[31] but strangers to the litigation who are not in privity with a party thereto are not concluded by the judgment.[32] The estoppel may be urged by the parties to the judgment and their privies,[33] but strangers not in privity may not take advantage of it.[34] A judgment against a party in one right or capacity does not estop him when suing in another right or capacity.[35]

[§ 2226] (b) Executors and Administrators. A judgment for or against an executor is not conclusive in favor of or against a subsequent administrator de bonis non,[36] nor is a judgment against an administrator de bonis non conclusive on the personal representative of the original executor or administrator.[37] A judgment against an administrator is not conclusive on a preceding administrator.[38] A judgment against collectors of an estate appointed pending proceedings to set aside a will is not conclusive on the executors.[39] A judgment against heirs[40] or distributees[41] is not binding on the executor or administrator. A recovery in trover against an administrator in favor of one claiming under a deed of a distributee is binding on the distributee's executor.[42] A judgment against a foreign executor or administrator is not binding on the domiciliary representative.[43]

rendered against a succession is not an absolute nullity, whether sufficient proof was adduced or not. Vaughn's Succ., 26 La. Ann. 149.

[b] Nonapproval of decree annulling sale.—In a suit by an administrator to enforce a vendor's lien brought in a district court, a decree rendered by consent annulling the sale is not void by reason of not having been approved by the probate court having jurisdiction of the estate. Titus v. Johnson, 50 Tex. 224.

[c] Right to question validity.—Although a decree pro confesso against an administrator is not an admission by him of the averments of the bill, yet he cannot complain that no proof was taken to establish complainant's case, where he is merely a nominal party to the action, and no relief is asked or granted against him, and decrees pro confesso are regularly entered against all the other defendants. [a] The acceptance of a judgment quando acciderint against an administrator will not estop plaintiff from afterward suing the administrator for the amount of such judgment on the ground that the administrator applied all the assets of his intestate's estate to the payment of a judgment fraudulently confessed by intestate in his favor, where plaintiff did not know of the fraud when he accepted his judgment. [a] Persons liable over.—Plaintiff as administrator delivered the assets of the estate to defendant in consideration of a promise to pay all claims arising against plaintiff as administrator. Afterward, on a claim being made against plaintiff, defendant was notified and promised to take care of it if sued, and, suit being brought against plaintiff, defendant neglected to attend to it, and a judgment was obtained against plaintiff, which he was compelled to pay. The claim was one which the estate was bound to pay and defendant had recognized it by promising to pay it. It was held that in a suit by plaintiff to recover the amount paid on the judgment, defendant was precluded from objecting that the claim on which the judgment was obtained was not against plaintiff as administrator. Randall v. Kelsey, 46 Vt. 158.

[b] Receiptor.—Where the administrator of a decedent who died during the pendency of the suit, after representing the estate as insolvent, has appeared in the suit as representative of the deceased party and submitted to a general default without suggesting the insolvency or praying for the stay of execution, the judgment awarded against the estate of the intestate in the hands of the administrator cannot be impeached in an action against a receiptor upon a receipt for goods of the original defendant attached on mesne process. (2) Where the probate court appoints a person to collect and preserve an estate until administration is granted, who as such personally cannot properly be sued on a bond of decedent, a judgment against him in such a suit is no bar to a new action against the administrator on such bond. Scott v. Ware, 64 Ala. 174.

[b] Judgment against estate.—If there is a vacancy in the office of executor of a deceased person at the time an action is brought, and judgment is rendered therein against the estate, the heirs are not bound thereby. Luco v. Commercial Bank, 70 Cal. 339, 11 P 650.

[d] A judgment obtained by one administrator against the other, touching the estate of the intestate, does not bind the heirs, although the administrator who was plaintiff never acted as administrator. Quinn v. Stockton, 2 Litt. (Ky.) 343.

[e] On the other hand it has been held: (1) That an administrator who is a party to an action involving the title of his intestate represents the title which the deceased had at his death, and judgment against him binds the heirs. Cunningham v. Ashley, 45 Cal. 485. (2) That the claim of a creditor of the succession, after having been established by judgment obtained against the executor, cannot thereafter be collaterally attacked in a suit by heirs, but must be classified as a liquidated debt of the succession. D'Aunoy's Succ., 3 La. Ann. 36. (3) That under the law authorizing proceedings by scire facias on a mortgage to enforce payment of the mortgage debt against the lands of a deceased mortgagor, a judgment against the personal representative is binding on the heirs. Biggerstaff v. Loveland, 8 Oh. 44. [a] A purchaser from a devisee is not bound by a judgment against the executor. Soles v. Hickman, 29 Pa. 342, 72 AmD 635.

Wilkinson v. Tuggle, 61 Ga. 381. (2) That where an executor one year before the limitation expired, indorsed, as payable in due course of administration, a mortgage note executed by his testator, and two years thereafter the creditor foreclosed the mortgage, the judgment of foreclosure is not impeachable, in an action for the mortgaged premises by a devisee, on the ground that the suit was brought after the note was outlawed. [b] Upon the delivery of a legacy to the legatee the privity between the executor and legatee ceases; and judgment in a suit subsequently commenced against the executor does not bind the legatee. Redmond v. Coffin, 17 N. C. 437.

[c] On the other hand it has been held: (1) That judgments obtained by innocent creditors against an executor on notes purporting to bear testator's signature but which had been forged by the executor in testator's lifetime are conclusive on the executor and on the legatees as his privies. Fraser v. Charleston, 19 S. C. 384. (2) That a decree against the executor of an executor is prima facie evidence to charge the legatee of the first testator. McMullin v. Brown, 11 S. C. Eq. 457. (3) That executors who are also made by the will trustees for infant legatees of their legacies, so long as they hold the personal property as part of the estate of testator for the payment of debts or legacies or as a residuum to be distributed, hold it by virtue of their office and are accountable for it as executors; and where they, being made defendants as executors to a suit to determine the interests of distributees in the residuum in their hands, appear as such, and the infants are also represented by a guardian, the judgment therein is conclusive on the beneficial interest of the infants, as against the objection that the executors were not before the court in their capacity as trustees. McCulloch v. Sample, 1 Penr. & W. (Pa.) 422.

[b] A conditional decree directing an executor to pay certain debts due by his testator's estate or due from him in his fiduciary capacity, when he shall have collected certain other specified claims or debts coming to his testator's estate, constitutes no lien upon the real estate of such executor. Gay v. Skeen, 36 W. Va. 582, 15 SE 64.

the judgment is a lien on the assets in the hands of the personal representative,[56] but the contrary rule is sometimes established by statute.[57] In cases where a lien is allowed, proceedings to establish or enforce it must be reasonably commenced.[58]

Judgment in favor of estate. Where an administrator having a judgment as such records a certificate of lien, the fact that the certificate is signed not only by him but also by those beneficially interested in the judgment does not invalidate it.[59]

[§ 2231] 7. Satisfaction and Set-Off. An individual indebtedness of an administrator to one against whom he has recovered judgment in his representative capacity cannot be credited on the judgment.[60] Satisfaction of a judgment in favor of a distributee against one to whom the administrator has wrongfully paid the distributee's share has the effect of extinguishing the administrator's liability to the distributee.[61] Judgments in favor of and against an executor or administrator may be set off against each other[62] where the debts are mutual and due to and from the same persons in the same capacity.[63] A proceeding by a debtor of decedent to set off a judgment obtained by him against decedent against a judgment obtained by the administrator on the debt due the estate is not affected by the insolvency of the estate.[64]

[§ 2232] 8. Revival of Judgment—a. Against Decedent.[65] A judgment against one who dies subsequent to its rendition may be revived against his personal representative by scire facias,[66] and in some states this is the only mode in which the judgment may be enforced against the estate.[67] The scire facias must contain a suggestion of the death of the judgment debtor and show the appointment of defendant in the writ as executor or administrator.[68] Nothing can be pleaded in defense of the proceeding that might have been pleaded in the original action,[69] but it is a good plea that defendant is not the personal representative of the judg-

[a] Illustrations of loss of lien.—(1) One obtaining a judgment against the estate cannot, after delaying to enforce his lien on decedent's land for thirteen years, enforce it as against one who purchases the land at the end of that time. Johnson v. Peck, 58 Ark. 580, 25 SW 865. (2) Where a judgment was recovered against executors prior to the act of 1834, and revived by scire facias against the executors only after that act and within five years, without making the owners of the land parties, the lands of devisees were discharged from the lien. Keenan v. Gibson, 9 Pa. 249.

[b] Married woman as judgment creditor.—Under the act of 1797, requiring debts of decedent to be sued upon within seven years to become liens upon his land, but allowing a feme covert four years after discoverture to bring such action, a judgment confessed by executors, more than seven years after the death of testator, to a married woman and her husband for her sole and separate use, for money loaned by her during her marriage, is within the exception of the statute and constitutes a lien on the land. Keil v. Wolf, 7 Pa. 424.

[c] Revival of judgment. — A judgment obtained against the administrators of an intestate within seven years after his death, and revived by a note made on the record of the original judgment of the agreement of the parties for that purpose, made within every five years, is such a due prosecution of the claim as will preserve the lien of the debt on the lands of the intestate according to the provisions of the act of 1797. Wikel v. Garrison, 82 Iowa 453, 48 NW 803. (2) A judgment in favor of a judge of probate in a suit on a probate bond brought in his name for the benefit of a legatee against an executor and his sureties may be set off against a judgment recovered by the executor in his individual capacity against the legatee. Barrett v. Barrett, 8 Pick. (Mass.) 342. (3) Distributees who have not received the shares due them under the decree of distribution are entitled, as against a creditor of the estate who did not present his claim or reduce it to judgment until years after the decree of distribution was passed, to have the amounts due them set off against judgments in favor of the administrator on notes given by the husbands of the distributees for the price of property sold by him. Abercrombie v. Abercrombie, 25 S. C. 45.

[b] Purchase of judgments.—(1) An administrator who has purchased a judgment against a plaintiff since the rendition of a judgment against him for a debt owing by the intestate cannot set off such judgment. Hills v. Tallman, 21 Wend. (N. Y.) 674. (2) Judgments against an administrator on debts contracted by the intestate cannot be purchased by a debtor of the estate, and alleged as counterclaims to judgments or demands due from him to the estate. Wikel v. Garrison, 82 Iowa 453, 48 NW 803.

[c] Assignment of judgment. — Where the assignee of a judgment against decedent brought an action of debt thereon and recovered judgment, it was too late for the executor to claim a set-off against plaintiff in the original judgment. Reigne v. Hunt, 1 Speers (S. C.) 281.

Convery v. Langdon, 66 Ind. 311; Carter v. Compton, 79 Ind. 37. If at the time of the death of the decedent the equities existing between him and one of his seeming debtors are such that the judgments which may be rendered on their respective claims ought to be set off one against the other, and that is accordingly done, then the judgment against the supposed debtor does not really constitute assets in the hands of the administrator, and the creditors have no lawful cause of complaint. This is upon the familiar principle that where items in an account against one apparently indebted to an estate are absorbed and cancelled in the settlement of mutual accounts between him and the decedent, such items do not become assets of the estate, and the creditors have no claim upon them as such, either legal or equitable. If, in such a case, nothing is left for the creditors, they are in no worse condition than are other unfortunate creditors who have no means of enforcing payment from those indebted to them").

69. Lynch v. Inglis, 1 S. C. L. 449 (an executor can plead nothing but ment debtor,[70] or that there are no assets of the estate.[71] It is no defense, however, that the personal representative has not accounted to the surrogate,[72] nor will an application of an executor to the orphans' court, representing that the real and personal property of decedent are insufficient to pay his debts, bar a scire facias issued to revive a judgment entered before the application was made.[73] Where the estate had not the means of paying a judgment against it, and one of two executors bought the judgment with his own money and had it assigned to a third person who issued scire facias thereon, naming both executors and also heirs as defendants, a plea of payment by the executors did not estop the executor who had bought the judgment from showing that it was in fact paid but that it was intended to be kept alive for his use.[74] A judgment of revival may be entered on default.[75] The judgment of revival should require the money to be made first out of the assets in the hands of the executor or administrator, and, failing in this, then out of the lands descended to the heirs.[76] Where a judgment against decedent has ceased to be a lien on his land by reason of lapse of time, it cannot be renewed against the administrator by acquiescence of the latter.[77]

[§ 2233] b. In Favor of or against Representative. In some states a judgment in favor of or against an executor or administrator may be revived by or against his successor in office;[78] but there is also authority for the contrary view.[79] A plea of plene administravit, when supported by the facts, may be sufficient in a proceeding to revive a judgment against a personal representative,[80] but such a plea is bad on demurrer where it appears that there is real estate which might be sold to pay debts, since the administrator is bound to sell such real estate for that purpose.[81] A plea that executors have not accounted to the surrogate has been considered good as against a scire facias issued on a judgment against the executors.[82] A judgment against an executor or administrator cannot be revived after his death against his own personal representative,[83] unless such judgment was binding on him in his individual capacity.[84]

Tex.—Austin v. Townes, 10 Tex. 24.

Va.—Wynn v. Wynn, 8 Leigh (35 Va.) 264.

[a] Purpose of statute. — The statute providing for the revival of judgments for or against the successors of executors or administrators by or against whom they were originally recovered is intended to do away with the common-law doctrine that a judgment vested individual rights in executors and administrators. Bowen v. Bonner, 45 Miss. 10.

[b] Privity of estate exists between an executor whose letters have been revoked and one to whom letters are granted under another will, and hence a judgment against the former may be revived against the latter. Borland v. Dexter, 13 Wkly NC (Pa.) 44.

[c] Procedure.—(1) An administrator de bonis non has a right to appear in court, suggest the death of his predecessor, and ask that a judgment recovered by such predecessor be revived in his name as successor in the administration; he need not resort to the writ of scire facias for that purpose. Bowen v. Bonner, 45 Miss. 10; Dibble v. Norton, 44 Miss. 158. (2) Prior to the act of 1846 (Hartley Dig. art 784), an action of debt on the judgment in the name of the administrator de bonis non was the proper remedy to revive a judgment recovered by a deceased administrator. Austin v. Townes, 10 Tex. 24.

[d] Name in which judgment should be revived.—(1) A judgment rendered in favor of A for the use of B, administrator of C, cannot be revived, on the death of B, in the name of D as administrator de bonis non of C, the original judgment not having been recovered by B in his representative character, nor constituting any part of the estate of C. Alexander v. Raney, 8 Ark. 324. (2) Where letters of administration have been revoked and an administrator de bonis non appointed, a scire facias cannot be sued out in the name of the former administrator to revive a judgment rendered in his favor while in office. Weaver v. Reese, 6 Oh. 418.

[e] Time of revival.—A judgment against an administrator can be revived by scire facias against the administrator de bonis non, his successor, more than seven years after its rendition, but less than seven years from the issuing of the last preceding execution thereon. Stith v. Parham, 57 Miss. 289.

[f] Judgment against person appointed to collect and preserve estate.—Where a court of probate appoints a person to collect and preserve the estate until administration is granted, such appointee cannot properly be sued on a bond of decedent, and if he is so sued and a judgment is rendered against him, a scire facias upon the judgment will not lie, after administration is granted, against the administrator. 79. Bobo v. Gunnels, 92 Ala. 601, 8 S 797 (a judgment against an administrator under which an execution against the estate has been returned unsatisfied cannot be revived against the administrator de bonis non, since there is no privity between the two).

84. Coates v. Muse, 5 F. Cas. No. 2,916, 1 Brock 529.

[a] Judgment against coexecutors and devisees.—Where, in a bill against two persons as joint executors who are also devisees and legatees of the testator, defendants permit a joint decree to be entered against them, the presumption is that they are liable in equal proportions, and, on entering a decree on a revival of the suit against their executors, it should be for a moiety of the joint decree against the representative of each in the first instance. Coates v. Muse, 5 F. Cas. No. 2,916, 1 Brock. 529. See also Coates v. Muse, 5 F. Cas. No. 2,917, 1 Brock. 539 (a decree against two executors jointly prima facie charges each executor equally, whether it is so expressed or not, but where on an application to carry the decree into execution it is shown that they were unequally indebted the decree may be revived against each according to his liability; but the fact that they were debtors to the estate in unequal sums for purchases made at the sale of the estate is no proof of their unequal liability).

85. Biddle v. Wilkins, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 686, 7 L. ed. 315; Oglesby v. Gilmore, 5 Ga. 56.

[a] Action in personal capacity.—After judgment recovered in a suit by an administrator, the debt is due to plaintiff in his personal capacity, and he may declare on it as such. Biddle v. Wilkins, 1 Pet. (U. S.) 686, 7 L. ed. 315.

[b] Suit in sister state.—An addecessor in office,[86] or by his decedent.[87] An action will not lie against an administrator in one state on a judgment obtained against a different administrator of the same estate appointed in another state.[88]

[§ 2235] b. Time to Sue and Limitations. An action upon a judgment against a personal representative must be brought within the time limited by statute.[89] Where the statute declares that a judgment against an administrator on a claim for money against the estate only establishes the claim in the same manner as if it had been allowed by the administrator and the judge, that the judgment must be that the administrator pay in due course of administration, and that no execution shall issue, nor shall the judgment create any lien on the property of the estate nor give the judgment creditor priority of payment, limitations do not run pending administration of the estate, against a judgment against the personal representative.[90]

[§ 2239] f. Evidence. In an action on a judgment quando acciderint against an administrator, plaintiff need not prove in the first instance that he is entitled to assets which he alleges have subsequently come into defendant's hands.[2] An allegation in the answer that no assets have come into defendant's hands since the judgment was rendered refutes the presumption of payment arising from lapse of time.[3] If, in an action by an administrator de bonis non on a judgment obtained by the executor, plaintiff alleges that the judgment was obtained by the executor, it will be presumed that the judgment was for a debt due testator.[4]

[§ 2240] U. Execution and Enforcement of Judgment—1. Enforcement against Representative as Such—a. In General.[5] Under the provisions of a number of statutes a judgment rendered against a personal representative on a claim against his decedent's estate can be enforced only by a proper proceeding in the probate court, in due course of administration,[6] and execution thereon, except from ministratrix who recovers judgment makes the debt hers individually, and she may sue thereon out of the state where she was appointed, allegations showing representative capacity being treated as surplusage. Newberry v. Robinson, 36 Fed. 841.

[c] Circumstances under which action unauthorized. — Where the statute provides that the surrogate may direct securities for the payment of money belonging to an estate to be deposited with a trust company, and that a security thus deposited shall not be withdrawn from the custody of the trust company and no person other than the proper officer of the trust company shall receive or collect any of the principal or interest secured thereby, without an order of the surrogate, an action by an administrator on a note thus deposited with a trust company, and the issuance of execution by him on the judgment recovered in such action, all without the order of the surrogate, are without right, and do not furnish a valid judgment and return of execution unsatisfied, such as is necessary to support a judgment creditor's action by the administrator. Ditmas v. McKane, 92 App. Div. 344, 86 NYS 1083 (such judgment is not validated, so as to support a judgment creditor's action by the administrator, by the fact that, after the rendition of the judgment and a return of the execution, he individually acquired title to the note).

the probate court, cannot be issued against the representative.[7] But at common law and also under some statutes a judgment obtained against the representative may be enforced by execution against the property of decedent in his hands to be administered, as in other cases in law or equity,[8] although it is sometimes required that leave of court to issue the execution shall first be obtained.[9]

[a] Where estate insolvent.—Under the statutes of New Jersey execution on a judgment against the representative cannot issue, where the estate is represented insolvent within the time limited to creditors to bring in their claims. Taylor v. Volk, 38 N. J. L. 204.

[b] A testamentary provision exempting the executor from giving bond does not authorize the issuance of execution against the estate. Lewis v. Nichols, 38 Tex. 54.

[c] A decree of foreclosure against mortgaged property of the decedent is within the application of this rule, since any process under which property may be sold is an execution within the meaning of the statute. Smithwick v. Kelly, 79 Tex. 564, 15 SW 486; Flack v. Braman, (Tex. Civ. A.) 101 SW 537. But compare Danzey v. Swinney, 7 Tex. 617 (where the claim is one secured by mortgage and has been rejected by the probate court, it may be carried to judgment in the district court and the property subject to the lien may be seized and sold by the sheriff and the proceeds of such sale be applied to the satisfaction of the judgment).

[d] Enforcement of vendor's lien.—In an action in the district court against administrators and others to foreclose a vendor's lien, a judgment against administrators for a deficiency should be enforced by the county court under the probate statutes, and not by an execution issued by the district court. Stewart v. Webb, (Tex. Civ. A.) 156 SW 537.

[a] A judgment quando acciderint (1) cannot be enforced by execution. Braxton v. Wood, 4 Gratt. (45 Va.) 25. (2) But plaintiff may proceed immediately by debt or scire facias to ascertain whether there is not a surplus of assets after paying the debts which have priority over his payment; and he thereby converts his judgment into a judgment de bonis testatoris and obtains a priority over other creditors in equal degree who have not recovered judgment. Braxton v. Wood, 4 Gratt. (45 Va.) 25.

[b] A decree directing several coexecutors to pay a certain sum to one of their number cannot be enforced by execution. Eisner v. Avery, 2 Dem. Surr. (N. Y.) 466.

[c] Order for payment into court.—Where judgment has been obtained against an estate, the administrator admitting that he has money on hand to pay it may be ordered to pay such money into the court. In re Gladough, 1 Alaska 649 (where the court, although admitting that execution against the administrator might be allowed in a proper case, was not disposed to order it under the circumstances).

9. See Wallace v. Holmes, 40 Pa. 427 (an order to show cause why execution should not issue upon a judgment against the decedent and revived against the representative, or upon a judgment against the representative, is required).

[a] This rule does not take away from the supreme court the power of controlling execution of its judgments. Marine Bank v. Van Brunt, 49 N. Y. 160 [aff 61 Barb. 361].

[b] An order in the alternative granting leave to issue execution, unless the representative applies for license to sell realty, is not authorized under such statutes. St. Johns v. Voorhies, 19 AbbPr (N. Y.) 53.

[c] A judgment within the meaning of these statutes (1) is one against a personal representative in his representative capacity after a trial upon the merits of the case (Schmitz v. Langhaar, 88 N. Y. 503; Peo. v. Judges Albany Mayor's Ct., 9 Wend. (N. Y.) 486), (2) whether it was recovered for a debt of the decedent or for one contracted by the representative for necessary and reasonable expenses of the administration (In re Thompson, 41 Barb. (N. Y.) 237 [aff 1 Redf. Surr. 490]), (3) not including, however, a judgment against him, after he has been discharged on a final accounting, on an indebtedness created by the decedent in his lifetime (In re Hathaway, 24 NYS 468, Pow. Surr. 447), (4) or a judgment in an action to recover damages for decedent's death (Matter of Jansen, 9 NYS 451, 1 Conn. Surr. 362), (5) or a judgment against a firm composed of a surviving partner and the executor of a deceased partner who was empowered by the will to carry on the testator's business (Columbus Watch Co. v. Hodenpyl, 135 N. Y. 430, 32 NE 239 [aff 61 Hun 557, 16 NYS 337]), (6) or a judgment in an action originally commenced against decedent and revived against his personal representatives (Thacker v. Bancroft, 15 AbbPr (N. Y.) 243).

[d] The pendency of an appeal from the judgment is no bar to a motion for leave to issue execution unless the proceedings have been stayed. Matter of Morey, 10 NYSt 693, 6 Dem. Surr. (N. Y.) 287; Keyser v. Kelly, 4 Redf. Surr. (N. Y.) 157; Smith v. Howell, 2 Redf. Surr. (N. Y.) 225.

[e] Nature of proceeding.—Where judgment is recovered against executors in the supreme court, a proceeding before the surrogate for leave to issue execution against them interested.[12] But before leave to issue such execution will be granted, it must be clearly made to appear by the application or by an accounting ordered by the surrogate that the representative has assets of the estate in his hands which are applicable to the payment of the judgment,[13] or that funds of the estate which ought to have been devoted to the payment of the judgment have been misapplied.[14] The burden rests upon the petitioner to satisfy the surrogate that the proper conditions exist to warrant the granting of the order authorizing the execution to issue,[15] but in a case where, on an application for an order directing an administrator to pay a judgment creditor, the administrator admitted that the assignment of the beneficial interest, on which judgment was based, was made prior to the decree for final accounting, thereby in effect admitting that applicant was a proper party thereto, it was held that the burden was on the administrator to show that the applicant was bound by the decree for final accounting by having notice thereof.[16] The execution, if issued, must substantially require the sheriff to satisfy the judgment out of the personal estate in the hands of the executor belonging to the estate of his testator.[17] But the surrogate should permit execution to issue only for a proportionate amount of the judgment,[18] unless it appears that other creditors of the estate will not be prejudiced by execution for the full amount of the judgment.[19]

One who has recovered a judgment against an administrator for funeral expenses should have leave to issue execution to the amount of a fund in the administrator's hands arising from an action for damages for the wrongful death of decedent.[20]

Order as to proceeds of partition sale. Where a judgment on a claim against a decedent's estate was obtained in an action against his administrator commenced more than three years after letters of administration were granted him, the proceeds of a sale in an action to partition decedent's real estate may not be ordered to be paid to the surrogate court, there to be accounted for, and eventually subjected to payment of the judgment.[21]

[§ 2242] c. Against Administrator De Bonis Non. It has been held that a judgment recovered against an administrator in chief cannot be enforced against an administrator de bonis non,[22] unless the judgment is revived against the latter administrator;[23] but there is also authority for the contrary view.[24]

[§ 2243] d. Enforcement in Equity. A judgment creditor, unless he has estopped himself by electing to rely on other remedies,[25] may in some cases resort to a court of equity for the purpose of enforcing his judgment,[26] even though execution cannot be issued against the representative.[27] Such a bill may be maintained for the purpose of reaching assets which have already been distributed or disposed of by the representative,[28] or for the dis-is a special proceeding de novo, to be begun by the filing of a verified petition and the issue of a citation or order to show cause, served on each of the executors. McGinn v. Lighthouse, 137 NYS 110.

12. Marine Bank v. Brunt, 49 N. Y. 160 [aff 61 Barb. 361]; McGinn v. Lighthouse, 137 NYS 110; St. John v. Voorhies, 19 AbbPr (N. Y.) 53.

[a] Where a judgment is recovered against several executors, each is entitled to service of an application for leave to issue execution thereon. McGinn v. Lighthouse, 137 NYS 110.

[b] Where an account by the executor shows the assets applicable to the judgment, leave to issue execution may be granted the judgment creditor, without citing the executor to account. Smith v. Howell, 2 Redf. Surr. (N. Y.) 325.

[c] Objection to failure to issue a citation is waived by the representative appearing and accounting and taking an appeal without objection to the irregularity. St. John v. Voorhies, 19 AbbPr (N. Y.) 53.

[a] This is true, although the representative gave an undertaking in the action, on which defendant cannot sue until he has had execution upon his judgment returned unsatisfied. Matter of Lazelle, 16 Misc. 515, 40 NYS 343, 2 Gibb. Surr. 47.

[b] An order or decree of a surrogate directing payment by a personal representative (1) is "conclusive evidence that there are sufficient assets in his hands to satisfy the sum" directed to be paid by the decree. Matter of Seaman, 63 App. Div. 49, 71 NYS 376; Matter of Weil, 110 App. Div. 67, 96 NYS 1017. (2) But this does not apply to a decree ordering payment by an administrator of a deceased executor, and execution in that case cannot issue without leave of the surrogate. Matter of Seaman, 63 App. Div. 49, 71 NYS 376.

[c] When accounting should be directed.—(1) Where, on application for leave to issue execution on a judgment against an administrator, it appears that the fund held by the administrator consists of a part of the proceeds of a judgment against the government in favor of decedent, based on a French spoliation claim, and the affidavit of the administrator expressly avers that there is not property in his hands applicable to the judgment, the court should direct an accounting. In re Warren, 105 App. Div. 582, 94 NYS 286. (2) Where there is no proof to overcome the administrator's affidavit that he had no assets in his possession when the judgment was rendered, and that he owned part of the property listed as assets of the estate, the proper practice is to require him to file an intermediate accounting, on which the question of existence of assets can be judicially determined. [a] Where the petition alleges that the representative has in his possession assets sufficient to satisfy the judgment, the burden of showing that they are insufficient to pay all debts, legacies, or other claims of the class to which plaintiff's claim belongs is upon the representative, and if he presents no papers in opposition the surrogate may grant the petition. [a] A creditor having an unproductive judgment against the admin-

covery and production of assets.[29] A judgment against the representative not expressed to be de bonis testatoris cannot be enforced in equity unless it is amended in that respect,[30] or unless the conditions of the case are such that it cannot be enforced against the representative, as where he is a nonresident and insolvent and all the assets of the estate have been distributed.[31]

[§ 2245] 3. Enforcement against Representative Individually—a. In General. Where the personal representative has been guilty of waste, and there is a return of nulla bona or nulla bona and devastavit on the original execution against him as representative, it is generally recognized that the judgment may be enforced against him personally; but the means of enforcing such a judgment are not uniform. At common law a judgment against a personal representative, as such, could be enforced against him individually by capias ad satisfaciendum or by fieri facias de bonis propriis, where the return on the original execution on the judgment was not only nulla bona, but also devastavit;[35] but where the return was merely nulla bona the earlier practice was to issue a special inquiry to determine whether the representative had wasted decedent's property, and if a devastavit was found, a scire facias was issued;[36] later, however, these proceedings were joined into what was called a scire fieri inquiry.[37] The waiver by the personal representative of a judgment debtor of the scire facias to revive might authorize an execution against the personal representative,[38] but not against the deceased debtor.[39] Under some statutes upon leave of the court after proper motion and notice[40] an execution de bonis propriis may issue against the representative personally, to be levied upon his individual property, where a return of nulla bona,[41] or nulla bona and devastavit,[42] is made on the execution de bonis testatoris, or where a judgment fixing him with assets is rendered against him.[43] A statutory execution is sometimes permitted to issue as of right against the representative and his sureties upon a return of "no property found."[44] In Louisiana execution can issue against a personal representative who fails to pay a judgment creditor of the succession only when he has funds on hand wherewith to discharge the debt and does not do so after due demand,[45] and where a personal rule or judgment is obtained against him after due notice of the judgment liquidating the debt;[46] or execution may be issued against an administrator personally where he makes a vague and insufficient answer to a rule taken by creditors whose claims have been fixed by a final judgment upon the administrator's account.[47] In Maryland it has been held that an absolute judgment against a personal representative is conclusive of the existence of the debt and of the sufficiency of assets to pay it, and that a fieri facias may be issued thereon and levied upon the lands of the representative as well as upon his goods and chattels.[48]

Judgment for disposing of widow's exemption. An executor's liability for disposing of articles required by statute to be set apart to the widow is a personal liability, and the judgment against him thereon is therefore properly enforced by rule.[49]

Action on bond to pay debts and legacies. A statute exempting the person and estate of an executor from execution for the debts and legacies of his testator has no application to an action on a bond given by the executor as residuary legatee conditioned to pay the debts and legacies of the testator.[50]

and upon the proof of a devastavit,[52] or upon the representative's failure to appear or to show cause why execution should not be awarded against him,[53] execution de bonis propriis may be awarded against him.[54] The writ must allege or suggest a devastavit by the representative,[55] and also the fact that a judgment was obtained against him in that character,[56] and must notify him to appear and show cause why execution should not issue against his own property,[57] although as to a defect of this character the writ may be amended.[58] It should also be against him in his representative capacity,[59] although, in the absence of pleading or proof to the contrary, it is not necessary to allege or show that defendant is the personal representative.[60] This proceeding is in the nature of an original action against the representative[61] in which he may set up any legal defense which he had no opportunity of pleading in the original suit,[62] but not matters which might have been pleaded therein.[63] Where the judgment rendered in the original action is considered an admission of assets to the amount of the claim in suit, the representative cannot set up fully administered or want of assets as a defense,[64] unless the nature of the original suit was such that the representative had no opportunity to set up such defense.[65] If the judgment is not an admission of assets, plene administravit may be pleaded.[66] If after verdict and before judgment defendant dies, and his administrator becomes a party to the suit, and judgment passes against him, and execution issues thereon, and is returned unsatisfied, on scire facias against the administrator he may plead no assets or insolvency, for he had no time to plead such plea in the original suit.[67]

writ of scire facias,[69] and sometimes a remedy concurrent with that writ.[70] The usual practice is not to bring such an action until after an execution has been issued and returned nulla bona,[71] although the action may be brought before this is done.[72] The foundation of this action is a devastavit committed by the personal representative, and without a suggestion or allegation and proof of a devastavit it cannot be maintained.[73] The representative may defend himself in such action by proving that there were goods of the intestate which might have been taken in execution of the judgment;[74] but he will not be allowed to plead any plea which assumes to place his defense merely on the want of assets;[75] or any other matter which he might or ought to have pleaded to the former action.[76] The amount of recovery in such action should in general be for the sum of the principal debt on which the judgment was rendered, together with interest and costs;[77] but if the representative pleads plene administravit and shows the real amount of assets in his hands unadministered at the date of the first judgment, the amount of recovery should be limited to that amount.[78] If a devastavit is established, an execution de bonis propriis may issue.[79]

[§ 2248] 4. Judgment for Representative's Personal Debts. The general rule is that a judgment against the representative for his individual debt cannot be enforced by execution against decedent's estate in his hands until there has been a final accounting and settlement of the estate.[80] It has been held, however, that as between the representative and his individual creditor assets of decedent may be seized and sold on execution wherever the representative has so dealt with the assets as to be responsible for a devastavit,[81] or has used them in a manner inconsistent with his trust.[82]

ciderint is rendered against an administrator who has pleaded plene administravit an action of debt suggesting a devastavit may be maintained on such judgment against the representative personally for assets subsequently coming into his hands. Willis v. Tozer, 44 S. C. 1, 31 SE 617.

[g] That plaintiff creditor did not present his claim to defendants under oath and affirmation is no defense to such an action. Howell v. Potts, 20 N. J. L. 569.

[h] Allegation of time and place.—A plea by a defendant that he did not waste, etc., any of the chattels which at any time came into his hands to be administered, etc., is not bad for failure to allege time and place, since it is merely a negative averment. Howell v. Potts, 20 N. J. L. 569.

[i] Insufficient pleas. — (1) In debt on a judgment against two administrators with a suggestion of a devastavit, a plea that they or either of them did not waste the goods, etc., which came into the hands of one of them is not sufficient, since it does not apply to what came into the hands of the other. Howell v. Potts, 20 N. J. L. 569. (2) A plea setting up an application to settle the estate as insolvent, as a bar to such an action, is insufficient under a statute providing that such application shall not bar an action against the administrator, except when the application is made before action is brought or pending the action, where it fails to allege that the application was made before the judgment was obtained against the administrator. [d] As to property transferred from the estate, execution cannot be property of the representative,[84] or upon personalty of the estate in the hands of a legatee or distributee with the representative's assent,[85] the creditor's remedy in such case being to pursue the representative at law or to follow the property in equity.[86] It has been held, however, that a creditor who has obtained judgment against an executrix may, within the limitation period, have execution levied upon land which the executrix in her individual right has redeemed from a mortgage executed by testatrix, although the executrix has conveyed the land to a third person.[87] A judgment de bonis propriis can only be executed upon the individual property of the representative, and not upon the property of the estate or of any other person.[88] Where a defaulting executor or administrator has no property in the county where the probate court having jurisdiction of his accounts sits, the issuance of execution to take his property in any other county is sometimes authorized by statute.[89]

[§ 2250] b. Lands of Decedent. As a general rule, an execution upon a judgment against a personal representative for a debt of decedent cannot be levied upon land which belonged to decedent.[90] Nevertheless, in some jurisdictions a resort to the land is permitted in case of necessity[91] as where there is a deficiency of personalty,[92] even though they have been partitioned and are in the hands of

[a] Reason for rule.—"The lands of an intestate, at common law and under our statutes, descend immediately to his heirs. The administrator takes no estate or interest in them; hence a judgment against him in any capacity cannot bind the lands. It has always been the policy of the law to prevent lands of a decedent from being subject to legal process issuing against personal representatives. Lands of an intestate are liable to process issuing against the heirs, because they are the owners, but not to that issuing against the personal representative, because he is not the owner, and has no interest therein, except that which the statute gives him of intercepting the possession and retaining it, if necessary, to collect rents, or to sell to pay debts in such cases, and in such mode and proceedings, and such only, as the statute authorizes and directs, and the statute has never authorized him or the creditors to sell it under an execution against the personal representative. If there be no necessity for renting, or for the sale of the lands for the purpose authorized by the statutes, the personal representative, of course, cannot intercept the possession for the purposes of thus administering the land. The administrator has no authority to charge the lands for any purpose, except as given him by statute; for at common law lands could not be sold for the debts of the decedent, and under our law they can be sold for such purposes only under the conditions and in the modes prescribed by the statute." Taylor v. Taylor, 162 Ala. 162, 166, 50 S 375.

[b] No revival against devisees.—On the return of nulla bona to an execution against an executor a scire facias will not lie to revive the judgment against the devisees to subject the real estate. Foster v. Sumner, 11 Miss. 606.

[c] Effect of testamentary direction for sale.—The real estate is not subject to execution, although decedent's will directed the sale of such real estate for the purpose of administration and distribution, since in such case the doctrine of equitable conversion does not apply. Matter of Hesdra, 23 NYS 842, Pow. Surr. 359.

[d] Lands devised to an executor for the payment of the testator's debts are equitable assets which a creditor can reach only through the aid of a court of equity, and are not subject to execution on a judgment against the executor. Helm v. Darby, 3 Dana (Ky.) 185; Smith v. Caswell, 3 N. C. 285. See also Matter of Hesdra, 23 NYS 842, Pow. Surr. 359 (land directed by will to be sold for purposes of administration).

[e] Land turned over to heir on final settlement.—Where land of an intestate is turned over in good faith by the administrator to the sole heir on final settlement, judgment thereafter against the administrator cannot be enforced against it by levy and sale without further proceedings. Jones v. Parker, 55 Ga. 11. To like effect Daniel v. Hollingshead, 16 Ga. 190.

[a] Where both heir or devisee and representative are sued, and nulla bona is returned as to the latter, the creditor may have satisfaction out of the real estate. Litsey v. Smith, 10 B. Mon. (Ky.) 74.

[b] Land fraudulently conveyed.—(1) A creditor may, on recovering judgment against his debtor's administrator, cause execution to be levied on land fraudulently conveyed by his debtor. Dunbar v. Kelly, 189 Mass. 390, 75 NE 740. (2) An execution issued upon a judgment recovered against an administrator of an estate represented as insolvent may, under Rev. St. c 76 §§ 13, 43, be legally levied on the real estate of the intestate fraudulently conveyed by him, if the administrator assumed the defense of the action pending against his intestate, and neglected to suggest the insolvency upon the record. Wyman v. Fox, 55 Me. 523, 59 Me. 100.

[c] Release of attachment.—A creditor of a deceased person obtaining judgment against the administrator is not estopped from levying his execution on the real estate of deceased by his release of the attachment on mesne process prior to the intestate's death. Tracy v. Strassel, 191 Mass. 187, 77 NE 700.

[d] An execution creditor will not be enjoined from selling real estate of a decedent on a judgment recovered against his administrator because of a defense to the judgment available in the action at law, even though the devisees and heirs at law are complainants in the bill for injunction; nor will such sale be enjoined on the ground that after the issuing of execution the administrator applied to the orphans' court for leave to sell land to pay debts which the personal estate was insufficient to pay, or on the ground that the administrator showed in his first account a balance due the estate. Holschumaker v. Etchells, 9 Del. Ch. 33, 74 A 644.

[a] Full administration and deficiency.—A judgment of execution the heirs or devisees,[93] or of purchasers from the heirs or devisees.[94] Special statutory proceedings are sometimes required in order to subject the land.[95]

[§ 2251] c. Under Judgment Quando Acciderint. A judgment quando acciderint applies to assets and property which may come into the representative's hands after the judgment is rendered, and it therefore can be levied on all of decedent's estate except such as was in the hands of the representative at the time of the judgment or such as had been previously administered by him.[96] Conversely, it has been held that scire facias to reach assets which have come into the representative's hands since the judgment was rendered can issue only on a judgment quando acciderint.[97]

[§ 2252] 6. Issuance, Form, and Requisites of Execution—a. In General. If the judgment fixes the liability upon decedent's estate, the execution should issue against the representative as such, and should direct the levy to be made upon the property of the estate in his hands to be administered.[98] If the judgment fixes the liability upon the representative individually, the execution should issue against him individually and should direct the levy to be made upon his individual property.[99] Under some statutes where the judgment is for debt or damages and costs, one execution may issue for the debt or damages against the estate of decedent and another for costs against the representative's individual property.[1]

The mere addition of the word "executor" or "administrator" to defendant's name in a decree or in the execution thereon, without anything further to indicate that it is against him in his representative capacity, does not prevent the decree from binding his personal goods and chattels and the execution from being levied thereon,[2] nor does it authorize a levy on property of decedent.[3]

[§ 2253] b. Time for Issuance. Execution upon a judgment rendered against a personal representative must be issued within the time limited by law, if any, after the rendition of the judgment,[4] unless a sufficient cause for delay is shown;[5] but under some statutes it cannot be issued until the expiration of a certain period of time.[6] against the real estate of a deceased debtor in the hands of his representatives cannot issue unless it appears that the executor has fully administered, and had not sufficient assets to satisfy the creditor's demand. Carwell v. Brodie, 5 N. C. 97.

[b] Proof of claim.—Judgments obtained against an executor of an administrator by a creditor of decedent are not alone such evidences of debt against the heir at law as to entitle the creditor to payment from the proceeds of the real estate; but when such proceeds are in the court, and a creditor wishes to subject them to his claim on the ground of a deficiency of personal assets, he need not exhibit full proof of his claim in the first instance. That may be done under an order nisi upon the heirs at law. Gaither v. Welch, 3 Gill & J. (Md.) 259.

93. Nowell v. Bragdon, 14 Me. 320.

[a] Extent.—An execution issued on a judgment against the goods and estate of a decedent in the hands of his executor or administrator may be legally extended on any lands of which decedent died seized, although a partition of them among the heirs or devisees may already have been made by order of the probate court. Nowell v. Bragdon, 14 Me. 320.

[b] Judgment after devisee in possession.—A devisee's possession of the devise, with the bona fide assent of the executor, ousts the right of creditors to sell the devise under a judgment obtained against the executor alone after such assent and possession. Rowell v. Hyatt, 108 S. C. 300, 94 SE 113.

[a] The petition should also set out and describe the real estate of a debtor against which the creditor seeks execution. Armstrong v. Milligan, 6 Blackf. (Ind.) 463.

[b] A judgment by default against some of defendants to such petition is erroneous, where no process appears to have been issued or publication made or where the record does not show the petition to have been proved. Berry v. Bullard, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 399.

[c] Prior to the Pennsylvania Act of 1834 a judgment against a representative, whether adverse or by confession, bound the lands of decedent without notice to the heirs or devisees. Payne v. [a] An erroneous judgment against a representative without designating him as such does not warrant an execution against the estate. McCullough v. Tidwell, 3 S. C. L. 479.

[b] Failure to describe defendant in representative capacity.—In a suit against an executor as such on a judgment against him in that capacity, where defendant admits the judgment and pleads payment, and at the trial, as a witness, admits the rendition of the judgment, it is immaterial that the fi. fa. on the judgment did not describe defendant in his representative capacity. Solomon v. Chapman, 9 Ga. A. 189, 70 SE 964.

[c] Execution against representative and surety.—Where a judgment de bonis intestati is rendered against an appellant who is administrator, and at a subsequent term judgment is rendered against his surety for the appeal, the entries only authorized one execution; de bonis intestati as to the principal, and de bonis propriis as to the surety. Bancroft v. Stanton, 7 Ala. 351.

[d] A variance (1) between the execution and the judgment is ground for quashing the execution. Moughon v. Brown, 68 Ga. 207. (2) But it does not render the execution void. Beale v. Botetourt Justices, 10 Gratt. (51 Va.) 278. (3) The execution may be amended on motion to correspond with the judgment. Empire State Chemical Co. v. Shubrick, 148 Ga. 551, 97 SE 541; Hollis v. regulating the levy of executions upon judgments[7] the personal representative is entitled to notice to choose the appraiser or appraisers, where appraisement is a requisite to a valid sale of the property,[8] or he may waive an inquisition and condemnation.[9] A suggestion of insolvency of the estate by the representative prevents an execution thereafter levied on the estate from creating a lien thereon, although the teste of the writ was dated prior to such suggestion.[10] A levy collusively made by the representative is void as against another creditor of the estate who makes a regular levy on the same estate.[11] Equity will relieve an executor from liability for forthcoming bonds given after confession of judgment, where he executed them believing the assets of the estate were ample to meet them but they proved not to be so by reason of an unexpected depreciation.[12]

[§ 2255] 8. Stay, Quashing, Vacating, and Relief against Execution.[13] An execution against a personal representative should be suspended where it does not show on its face whether it is to be satisfied out of the individual property of defendant representative or out of the property of his decedent;[14] or until it is determined what amount of assets is applicable thereto;[15] or, it has been held, where it appears that the personal assets are insufficient to pay all debts, until an application for the sale of real estate is made.[16] An execution upon a judgment rendered for or against a personal representative may also be stayed, under some statutes, by defendant giving a proper bond;[17] or where equitable circumstances exist, as where the estate has been represented insolvent,[18] a court of equity may restrain the execution by an injunction.[19] So also where a creditor, who recovered judgment against a debtor in his lifetime, did not sue out execution, on reviving such judgment by scire facias against the administrators of the debtor after his death, he will be enjoined from enforcing his judgment beyond the pro rata share to which he may be entitled.[20] An execution issued by a representative who had power only to prosecute the action will be vacated;[21] and the fact that he afterward obtains authority to issue such execution will not cure the illegal issuance.[22] Sureties who have been released or discharged from liability on the administration bond may obtain relief from a statutory execution ment in an action commenced against a representative after the making of an order, authorized under the supplement of March 17, 1855, to the Orphans' Court Act, §§ 22, 24, limiting creditors to nine months within which to bring in their claims, until ten months after the making of such order).

16. Dundas v. Leiper, 1 Phila. (Pa.) 569 (holding, however, that a levari facias on a mortgage is not an execution, within the act of Febr. 24, 1834 § 35, directing that in case of an execution against executors if the personal assets are insufficient to pay all debts the court shall stay proceedings until application is made to the orphans' court for the sale of the real estate, and hence the proceedings will not be stayed to enable executors to apply to the orphans' court for a sale of the premises as provided by the act). Abbott v. Tenney, 18 N. H. 109.

[b] Judgment against representative as such not repleviable.—A judgment against an administrator in his representative capacity is not a repleviable judgment within the meaning of the statute authorizing a stay of execution upon the giving of repleviable bail, and therefore the representative is not liable on such bail given to secure a stay of such a judgment. [b] Failure to plead limitations no ground for injunction.—Where an executor is under no legal or moral duty to plead limitations to an action against him, his failure to do so affords no ground for an injunction against the enforcement of the decree. Lee v. Colston, 5 T. B. Mon. (Ky.) 238.

[c] Right of creditor.—Although the heirs renounce, a creditor cannot, without letters of curatorship, enjoin an execution sale of the property under a judgment against decedent. A curator must be appointed, and the injunction prosecuted by him. Vienne v. Boissier, 10 Mart. (La.) 359.

[d] Fault of representative.— Where the representative who seeks relief shows that the erroneous execution was attributable to his own culpable negligence or misconduct, and comes into court without having done equity, he will not be relieved by equity. Kearney v. Sascer, 37 Md. 264.

[e] Levy under execution against representative individually.— Where property in the hands of the representative is levied on under an execution against him individually, the probate court will enjoin the sale of the property until the representative accounts and the property belonging to him individually is thereby ascertained. [f] Levy on property specifically bequeathed.—Where execution against the goods of a testator is levied on property specifically bequeathed by him, and allotted to the legatee by the executor, an injunction ought to be granted to restrain proceedings until an account of the assets remaining unadministered should be taken. [h] Proceedings under a special execution, allowed by statute against the estate of a decedent whose lands have been sold under a prior execution, upon condition that the land is first redeemed from the prior execution sale, will be enjoined where the first execution has been set aside in equity. issued against them and the representative by a supersedeas,[23] or by motion to the court, if in session, to quash the execution,[24] or if there are equitable circumstances by a bill in equity.[25] A variance between the execution and the judgment may constitute a valid ground for quashing the execution.[26]

[§ 2256] 9. Sale—a. In General. A sale of a decedent's property under execution upon a judgment rendered against his personal representative passes a good title to the purchaser only where all the statutory requirements have been complied with,[27] and the sale conforms to the judgment and execution,[28] and is of property subject to such execution.[29] But where the purchaser has acted in good faith and the heirs or devisees have received a benefit from the proceeds of the sale, as by such proceeds being applied to the payment of debts to which the property was subject, equity will not permit the property to be recovered from the purchaser except upon his being reimbursed.[30] Where, after a writ of venditioni exponas has been issued and stayed, an administrator de bonis non with the will annexed is substituted as defendant, and he permits a pluries writ to be issued and the property to be sold by the sheriff and a sheriff's deed to be executed and acknowledged, he waives such irregularities affecting innocent purchasers at the sale as that the executor of defendant was the substituted defendant at the time the fieri facias was issued, although he had previously renounced as executor.[31]

On foreclosure of vendor's lien. It has been held that in an action against administrators and others to enforce a vendor's lien, the district court has jurisdiction to enforce its judgment by a sale of the property instead of leaving its enforcement to the county court under the probate statutes.[32]

Where execution is not permitted to issue against a decedent's estate, a sale of decedent's property under such execution is void,[33] although the representative made no objection to the proceedings and received the surplus of the proceeds after payment of the amount of the judgment upon which the execution issued.[34]

The rule, it seems, is the same when personal estate is levied on. Huger v. Dawson, 37 S. C. L. 328.

[b] Distinction between realty and personalty.—Where personalty is sold, the whole proceeds, if these are needed, go to payment of the execution debt; but where land is sold the proceeds must be applied to all debts in their order of priority. [§ 2258] V. Review[40]—1. In General. Appeals from judgment or orders in probate matters or on claims against a decedent's estate are governed and controlled by the statutes regulating the settlement of decedents' estates;[41] and judgments or orders against a decedent's estate not provided for by these statutes are not appealable unless they come within the statutes relating to appeals in civil cases generally.[42]

[§ 2259] 2. Right and Duty to Appeal. An appeal from a judgment or order rendered against or affecting a decedent's estate may be taken by his personal representative,[43] unless he has resigned or been removed, in which case his successor may prosecute the appeal, upon his being made a party to the suit.[44] It has been held that heirs of a decedent may also appeal from a judgment against the estate by which they are aggrieved,[45] but it has also been held that the heirs have no standing to appeal in an action involving personal property and assets,[46] and that a residuary legatee cannot obtain a review by writ of error of a judgment on a claim against the estate.[47] Under some statutes, if a personal representative declines to appeal, any party interested may do so.[48] Executors have no personal interest in a decree awarding certain increase of the estate to the life tenants, as against the residuary legatees, and are not entitled to appeal therefrom;[49] nor is an executor aggrieved by a decree directing him to pay to the widow insurance upon his decedent's life where he is protected from claims of creditors by such decree.[50] Neither has an executor, in his individual capacity, any standing to appeal from an order enjoining him from disposing of the estate during the pendency of an action to determine the validity of the will.[51] As an administrator cannot maintain a bill to remove a cloud from the title to land owned in fee by his decedent,[52] he is not an interested party entitled to appeal from a decree in such a case.[53]

[§ 2260] 3. Time for Appeal. The time for taking an appeal from a judgment or order for or against a decedent's estate is regulated by the statutes relating to appeals in matters connected with decedents' estates,[54] or by the statutes relating to

Where there is a balance remaining after sale of part of intestate's real estate in satisfaction of executions, the administrator is not entitled to the surplus either in law or equity as assets for payment of debts, although the creditors themselves might have claimed it at law. [c] Appeal not taken in individual behalf.—Where an action was brought against an administrator in his official capacity to recover a money judgment against the estate, so that it was impossible under the pleadings for a judgment to have been rendered against him individually, or for him to have had a personal interest in the subject matter of the proceedings, a designation of himself in the pleadings, in the assignments of error and in the record generally as "defendant, G. C. A., administrator," etc., could not be deemed as a designation of himself in his personal right; nor would an appeal by him be dismissed as an appeal taken on his own behalf. Altgelt v. Elmendorf, (Tex. Civ. A.) 84 SW 412.

Miller v. Neff, 33 W. Va. 197, 10 SE 378, 6 LRA 515.

[b] Where an administrator appeals from an order removing him, it is regular for him to proceed with the suits he has brought until the decision of the appeal; and any default taken while the appeal is pending will be regular, although the order removing him is subsequently affirmed. [c] Refusal of new appointee to act.—Where an administrator who is appointed pending an appeal from a judgment against an executor who has been removed refuses to prosecute the appeal, a legatee cannot claim to be substituted as plaintiff to prosecute the appeal, as the removal of the executor did not in itself affect the litigation, and until the administrator is substituted the original plaintiff will continue to be such in his capacity as executor, and he can allow the legatee as party in interest to prosecute the appeal. appeals in civil cases generally,[55] according to whether the judgment or order appealed from is within one or the other of such statutes.

[§ 2261] 4. Bond. In most jurisdictions an appeal bond need not be given by a personal representative, unless the appeal is from a judgment affecting him personally,[56] and the same is true in some jurisdictions in reference to a supersedeas bond,[57] although it is sometimes left to the discretion of the court whether or not such bonds shall be given by the representative.[58]

Liability of sureties.[59] The manner in which a judgment against the representative is to be paid does not affect the primary liability of sureties on their bond, although the compliance with the judgment in manner and form expressed may discharge them from all obligation.[60]

Rights of surety on supersedeas bond on payment of judgment. A representative's execution of a supersedeas bond creates no privity between the sureties and the estate, and the sureties' payment of the judgment on affirmance gives them no right of action against the estate.[61] They can only recover against property devised or bequeathed by being subrogated to the rights of the representative, who can only recover as for an original deficiency of assets, and not for a deficiency caused by his own want of diligent and prudent administration.[62]

Equitable relief from bond. Where an executor enters into a certiorari bond, on which a judgment has been had, he cannot be relieved in equity if the estate is solvent, although the assets are real and not yet converted into money.[63]

[§ 2262] 5. Notice of Appeal. All persons interested in the judgment or order appealed from should be served with notice of the appeal.[64] A personal representative must give the requisite notice of appeal, although he has under the statute the privilege of appealing without giving bond.[65]

[§ 2263] 6. Transcript and Filing Thereof. The transcript on appeal must be filed within the time allowed therefor by statute,[66] or the appellate court will not acquire jurisdiction.[67]

[§ 2264] 7. Parties. All persons interested in the judgment or order appealed from should be made parties to the appeal,[68] but the heirs are not necessary parties, as the representative has full power to represent the whole estate for the purposes of the appeal.[69] One of two or more representatives cannot appeal from a judgment or decree rendered against the estate, without joining the other representative,[70] unless a severance in pleading appears on the record.[71] Although a suit may have been brought by one of two executors against his coexecutor and another, alleged to be interested in defeating a valid demand of the estate, yet, if the facts at the trial show that the executor named as a defendant has no personal interest in the outcome of the litigation, he may, on the death of plaintiff, after writ of error sued out, be substituted as party entitled to represent interests of testator's estate.[72] Where a minor distributee of an estate, by her guardian, filed in the district court a motion to reinstate on the docket an appeal in an action against the administrator of the ancestor's estate, brought by persons representing all the distributees, and asked for her proportionate share of the judgment recovered by them in the county court against the appealing administrator, she thereby became a party to such action, and was charged with notice of an instrument filed by the persons representing the distributees, acknowledging settlement with the administrator, since his appeal, in reliance on which the court dismissed the appeal.[73]

[a] Cases in which general statutes govern.—The statutes relating to appeals in civil actions, and not those relating to appeals in matters connected with decedent's estate, regulate the time for appeal: (1) In an action by a personal representative for the collection of assets of the estate. [a] Treating appeal as vacation appeal where record not filed in time.—Under Burns St. Annot. [1901] § 657, providing that administrators may have an appeal and stay of proceedings in the court below without giving an appeal bond, the appeal of an administrator who fails to procure a stay of proceedings in the lower court, and who fails to file the record in the appellate court within the time allowed by law for term time appeals, must be treated as a vacation appeal. properly raised in the lower court and preserved in the record cannot be considered on appeal from a judgment for or against the personal representative.[74] Thus it cannot be contended for the first time on appeal from such judgment that a claim against the estate had not been authenticated and presented to the representative for allowance or rejection,[75] that the person suing or defending as personal representative has no right to sue or defend in that capacity,[76] that there was a defect in the pleading,[77] that persons who were proper parties to the suit were not brought in,[78] that the claim sued on was not verified as required by statute,[79] or that the judgment against the representative was not in the proper form.[80] But it has been held that, under a general exception to the decision, a personal representative, appealing from a judgment against him, may raise for the first time in the appellate court the point that plaintiff failed to prove that the action was brought within the statutory time after a rejection of the claim.[81]

have not been complied with.[85] A motion by an administrator de bonis non to dismiss an appeal on behalf of the estate will prevail as against a protest filed by an attorney for some of the heirs which is not supported by a showing justifying a denial of the right of the administrator to control the litigation.[86] Where upon an appeal the case is to be tried de novo, a personal representative who was defendant in the court below and has taken an appeal cannot dismiss the appeal of his own volition.[87] The legal representatives of a deceased executor cannot consent to the dismissal of an appeal taken by the executor officially.[88]

[§ 2267] 10. Determination and Disposition of Cause. The appellate court will presume on an appeal from a judgment for or against a personal representative that all the statutory prerequisites have been complied with;[89] and as a general rule will not review the lower court's findings of fact.[90] If the record shows that material errors occurred in the proceedings in the lower court the judgment may be reversed,[91] or may be remanded for further proceedings if the justice of the case seems to require such proceedings,[92] as where the lower court erred in sustaining exceptions to a plea.[93] But if no error is found,[94] or the error is a harmless one,[95] or was caused or invited by the appealing party,[96] the judgment will be affirmed.[97] Mere clerical errors,[98] as where the clerk of the lower court enters judgment against the representative instead of against the decedent's estate or vice versa,[99] or makes a mistake in the name of the representative,[1] may be amended or corrected by the appellate court. Where an administrator appeared to an action, and demurred solely as administrator, and the judgment entered after sustaining his demurrer ran in his favor solely as administrator, and he, as an individual, was not brought within the jurisdiction of the court, and plaintiff's counsel in their brief treated the action as one against the administrator as such, it was held that the action would be deemed on appeal to have been one against the estate, and the judgment would be sustained if no cause of action was alleged against it.[2]

representative cannot be presumed to know exactly what the case may turn out to be upon investigation and consequently should not be required to pay the costs himself;[5] and it has been observed that "few administrators would take the risks of suit, if they were required to pay the costs if unsuccessful and estates would thus often suffer by reason of their rights not being properly enforced."[6] It is very generally held, however, that the exemption of a personal representative from liability for defendant's costs is not an exemption from the obligation of his own contracts, or a privilege to procure gratuitous services; in other words, he must pay his own costs.[7] If the personal representative is successful in his action, he is not personally liable for costs where defendant proves insolvent.[8]

[§ 2269] (bb) Extent and Limits of Rule. Ordinarily the general rule that a personal representative necessarily suing in his fiduciary capacity is not liable for costs on failure of his suit applies, although the suit is terminated by nonsuit,[9] and if he has acted in good faith in bringing the suit he will be permitted to discontinue without paying costs upon discovering that he has no cause of action.[10] The rule applies also to suits commenced by decedent and revived by the representative,[11] to suits by an administrator de bonis non on a note given to the administrator in chief in that capacity, for goods of the estate,[12] to suits in which the administrator has been removed before judgment,[13] to proceedings in error in an action brought by the personal representative to recover a debt due his intestate,[14] and to an appeal taken by decedent and prosecuted by his executor.[15] On the other hand, notwithstanding the fact that suit is necessarily brought by the personal representative in his capacity as such, he will, if unsuccessful, be personally liable for costs where the suit is vexatious or wanton[16] or known by him to be groundless,[17] where his prosecution of the suit is without the care and inquiry which ordinary prudence would have suggested,[18] or where he sues in a representative capacity without legal authority to do so[19] or unnecessarily takes an appeal.[20] The costs of an attempt by an executrix to compel her coexecutrix to join in a conveyance of real estate improperly sold by the former to her husband must be borne by her and not by the estate.[21] Where judgment, as in case of nonsuit or by default, is rendered for not proceeding to trial and no excuse is shown, costs may be awarded against the personal representative individually.[22] These cases are in principle like interlocutory orders for the payment of costs upon some default or motion.[23] Where the representative seeks the allowance of a fraudulent demand in his own behalf upon final settlement and the heirs prevail in resisting the demand, costs should be taxed against him personally and not against the estate;[24] and where a default judgment in favor of the representative is set aside by motion for irregularity, he will be ordered to pay the costs of the motion.[25]

[§ 2270] bb. Actions Which May Be Brought in Individual Capacity. Where a personal representative brings suit on a cause of action accruing after decedent's death, that is, on a contract made with himself or for a wrong done to the estate in his possession, he is personally liable for costs if he fails in his action.[26] The reason is said to be that, inasmuch as the personal representative is a party to the transaction, he is presumed to know all about it, and to act upon his own responsibility, and therefore should not be permitted to burden the estate with costs in case of failure,[27] and even though he sues in his representative capacity on a cause of action of this character he cannot thereby evade liability for costs,[28] the true rule being that if it is not necessary for plaintiff to name himself as executor or administrator he shall pay costs.[29] The doctrine of some of the early decisions to the effect that plaintiff's liability to costs depended on the question whether the money recovered would be assets or not [30] has long since been exploded and was contrary to older authorities than those by which it was set up.[31] It has also been held that, although the representative is successful in his action, he and not the estate is liable for costs on failure to collect them from defendant.[32]

[§ 2271] (b) Under Special Statutes. The rule exempting the personal representative from personal liability for costs in actions which he was obliged to bring, if at all, in his representative capacity [33]

N. S.—Granger v. O'Neill, 31 N. S. 462.

"Where a cause of action accrues to the personal representatives of the decedent, as distinguished from a cause of action which accrued to the decedent, whether the personal representative prosecutes the action in his name individually or in his representative capacity, it is to be deemed, for the purpose of taxation of costs, an action by him individually, and if the action be brought in his representative capacity, and he is unsuccessful, the costs may be taxed against him individually without an application to the court." Leavett v. Jas. F. Scholes Co., 210 N. Y. 107, 112, 102 NE 965 [rev 148 App. Div. 78, 132 NYS 1033].

"The matter now under consideration for which the complainant seeks redress is thus shown to be an alleged injury to the complainant in the conduct of the business incident to the settlement of his intestate's estate and not an injury done to the intestate himself in his lifetime. Under such a showing the defendant is, I think, entitled to costs when he successfully resists the complainant's attack." Ivins v. Jacob, 67 N. J. Eq. 387, 390, 58 A 941.

[a] An action by an executor for a conversion occurring immediately after testator's death, whether prosecuted in his name individually or in his representative capacity, is, for purposes of taxation of costs, an action by him individually, and costs may be taxed against him individually on judgment being rendered for defendant, without the direction of the court. Dunphy v. Callahan, 126 App. Div. 11, 110 NYS 179 [aff 194 N. Y. 587 mem, 88 NE 1118 mem].

[b] On declaration demurrable for failure to show capacity.—In an action by an administrator upon a debt due him in his representative capacity, on demurrer sustained to the declaration because it does not show that plaintiff sues in his representative character, judgment against plaintiff de bonis propriis for costs is correct. Watkins v. McDonald, 3 Ark. 266.

[c] Limitations of rule.—A cause of action on a note made payable to decedent or bearer forms an exception to the general rule that the representative must sue in his capacity as such on a cause of action accruing in the lifetime of decedent, but notwithstanding this fact an administrator suing in his representative capacity on a note of this character is not personally liable for costs if his suit fails. has, in a number of jurisdictions, been modified by statutes abolishing the distinction in this respect between such actions and those which may be brought in an individual capacity,[34] imposing individual liability for costs in all cases where a personal representative is unsuccessful in an action prosecuted by him,[35] or permitting the court to direct that the representative be personally held for the costs when it deems such action proper because of his conduct in relation to the action.[36] Under some of these statutes a personal representative, after payment, may charge the amount in his account of administration to be allowed or not as it may appear to the judge of probate that the suit was discreet or otherwise.[37] Under others the personal representative is entitled to an allowance for the costs if the court awarding them certify that there were probable grounds for instituting the action in which the costs were awarded, but not otherwise.[38] It is sometimes provided that on return unsatisfied of an execution sued on a judgment for costs upon nonsuit in an action by an administrator, execution may be awarded against the administrator for the seizure of his property if he fails to show cause why it should not be awarded against him.[39] A special administrator in whose name a suit is brought is sometimes specially exempted from liability for costs.[40]

[§ 2272] (2) Actions against Personal Representative—(a) In Absence of Special Statute. The general rule is that the personal representative who makes an unsuccessful defense is not personally liable for costs, which are payable out of the assets in his hands in the same manner as the debt for which judgment was recovered.[41] The representative may, however, be liable personally for costs where he has pleaded a false plea,[42] that is to say, sets up new matter in avoidance of the action and fails in supporting it.[43] He may also render himself liable in case he is guilty of a devastavit,[44] or of mismanagement, misconduct, or fraud.[45] It is also held, in some cases, that if the assets of the estate are insufficient to satisfy the costs of an action successfully prosecuted to judgment against a personal representative, they are to be levied out of his individual estate.[46] In a case where, in a suit to set aside deeds and a bill of sale brought against a defendant in his representative capacity as administrator, it appeared that defendant took the instruments with actual knowledge of the purpose for which they were given, knowing that they were intended to convey in trust only, and that he repudiated the trust, it was held that the court properly taxed costs against him individually on decreeing a cancellation of the instruments.[47]

[§ 2273] (b) Under Special Statutes—aa. In General. In several states there are statutory provisions pursuant to which, under certain circumstances, costs may be taxed individually as against a personal representative who is sued in his representative capacity.[48] In actions to which such statutes are applicable, personal representatives are entitled to one lawful trial and to exemption from costs, saving the excepted cases, which trial must be a binding one determining their liability and sufficient to stand the test of an appeal if one is taken.[49]

[§ 2274] bb. Actions or Proceedings to Which Statutes Applicable. Such statutes have been held not to apply to an action against a personal representative on a contract made by himself,[50] to an action brought against deceased in his lifetime and revived after his death,[51] to a proceeding to subject a personal representative to liability for misapplication of assets,[52] or to an action by a sheriff against an executor in aid of an attachment against the distributive share of a legatee, such action being independent of any matters concerning the administration.[53]

[§ 2275] cc. Grounds of Allowance—(aa) In General. The grounds for taxing costs against the representative personally are unreasonable resistance to or neglect to pay the claim, refusal to refer the matter in controversy, or failure to file a written consent that a rejected claim is heard and determined by the surrogate on settlement of the representative's accounts.[54] If either ground is established, a case is made for the award of costs,[55] provided the steps made necessary by statute as a prerequisite to the allowance have been complied with,[56] but unless one of these grounds is fairly established costs cannot be awarded against the representative personally.[57] Where executors who had no duties to perform in connection with certain property insisted on a right to act therein to the disadvantage of the devisee, and in violation of her legal rights, in refusing to give possession, they were acting personally, and were individually chargeable with the costs of an action by her to enforce her rights.[58]

[§ 2276] (bb) Unreasonable Resistance of Claim. A personal representative cannot be said to have unreasonably resisted a claim within the meaning of the statutes merely because his defense failed,[59] or because plaintiff recovers the full amount of his demand,[60] and a fortiori he is not chargeable with an unreasonable resistance where he succeeds in obtaining a material reduction of the claim.[61] There is no unreasonable resistance such as will subject the personal liability for costs where his refusal to pay the claim is based on the ground that he has no assets,[62] where it appears that his defense would probably have been successful, if at the trial he could have procured his witness,[63] where suit on a claim is commenced before the representative has a reasonable time to examine it,[64] where resistance is made under advice of counsel,[65] or where the credit was originally given and the amount charged to a third person, but it appeared on the hearing to be for the benefit of decedent.[66] Where before the expiration of the period allowed for the payment of debts suit is brought on a claim which he has promised to pay, the conclusion of unreasonable resistance is not warranted, merely because when sued after promise to pay he disputes his liability to the action in his representative capacity.[67] Where interest in excess of the legal rate has been paid voluntarily, without any agreement, on certain notes, so that a question arose whether the notes were usurious, or whether the excess payments of interest should not be credited on the principal, the administrators of the maker of the notes are justified in resisting payment, so as to procure the determination of the question by the court, and costs should not be awarded to the holder of the notes on procuring judgment against the administrators for the amount thereof.[68]

The representative is guilty of an unreasonable resistance where the defense is instituted merely for the purpose of delaying payment rather than in the expectation of defeating a recovery,[69] where the question of law involved was simple and had been held against him by an appellate court and the expenses of further litigation were likely to amount to considerably more than the claim itself,[70] or where there was no defense on the merits against the claim and the only issue presented was whether the claim was barred by the short statutes of limitation, which was determined against the representative.[71] Where, in an action against executors on a note indorsed by testator, the only question litigated was whether testator had waived protest, and such fact was established by a son of testator who was also the father of the executor and brother of the executrix, whose testimony was not disputed, and whose whereabouts were at all times known to defendants, a finding that payment was "unreasonably resisted" was warranted.[72]

[§ 2277] dd. Prerequisites to Allowance—(aa) Presentation of Claim—aaa. In General. Under the statutes under consideration costs cannot be recovered in a suit against the personal representative, unless the claim in suit was presented within the time prescribed by statute,[73] and it has been held that it must be presented in writing.[74] The fact that the payment of the claim had been unreasonably resisted does not alter the rule, as presentation within the time limited and unreasonable resistance of the claim must concur to authorize an allowance of costs.[75] To entitle a plaintiff to costs it must appear that the demand which had been presented for payment, or which plaintiff had offered to refer, were substantially the same as that upon which the recovery was had,[76] and if plaintiff should serve a bill of particulars claiming other demands it seems that he would lose his costs.[77] Where the claim presented is based upon a special contract for work and labor and a recovery had for a considerably less sum on a quantum meruit plaintiff is not entitled to costs.[78] On the other hand the fact that the amount claimed in the account as presented was larger than the amount named in the complaint and much larger than that recovered will not prevent a recovery of costs where it is for the same services and disbursements and the representative is in no way misled or prejudiced by the amount.[79] A creditor does not lose his right to costs by including in the declaration other claims than the one offered to be referred where no attempt was made to give evidence in regard to such other claims.[80] If the claimant has precluded himself from recovering costs against the administrator in an action on a claim he cannot recover costs against a defendant other than the personal representative who was surety for decedent on the claim sued on.[81]

[§ 2278] bbb. Effect of Failure to Advertise for Claims. The fact that executors or administrators have never advertised for the presentment of claims does not entitle a creditor to recover costs in a suit brought against them.[82] Conversely the fact that there has been no advertisement to present claims does not prevent an allowance of costs, if the claim has been duly presented and one of the grounds for allowance of costs provided by statute is shown.[83] Nor is it requisite that the claim be presented during the publication of the notice to creditors, because claims may be presented at any time after personal representatives qualify and enter upon their duties.[84]

[§ 2279] (bb) Certificate of Judge or Referee. Under statutes providing that, where an action on a claim against a decedent's estate is brought in the supreme court, it is necessary to entitle claimant to costs, for the judge or referee to certify that payment of the claim was unreasonably resisted or neglected, the allowance of costs to plaintiff without such certificate having been made is erroneous,[85] unless it is waived by stipula-

[a] Reason for rule.—An executor is not bound to give this notice in any case, and does not violate his duty by its total omission. He may give notice for his own protection, or for the benefit of the estate he represents, but there is nothing in the statute which makes it compulsory on him to do so nor which subjects him to costs for failure to give the notice. "Inasmuch as there must be a new trial, it may not be out of place to call attention to the fact that the plaintiff was not entitled to costs. Such costs were awarded without any certificate or finding of the trial judge showing the facts upon which the award was founded. The Code of Civil Procedure (§ 1835) forbids the allowance of costs in an action brought against an executor or administrator in his representative capacity, except as prescribed in section 1836, which permits such an award where it appears that the claim was duly presented; that its payment was unreasonably resisted or rejected; or that there was a refusal to refer. Since these facts de-tion.[86] The certificate, however, is required only for the recovery of costs and not of disbursements.[87]

Plaintiff is entitled to a certificate such as the statute prescribes where the facts warranting it exist.[88]

Form and sufficiency. A certificate by a referee that plaintiff is entitled to recover a sum "with the usual costs and disbursements" is not sufficient.[89] A certificate is not defective because it states that payment of the claim was unreasonably resisted and neglected "and" defendant did not file the consent to have it determined upon the settlement of his accounts instead of stating the two grounds in the disjunctive.[90]

Effect of certificate. The certificate of the referee before whom the trial took place that before the action was commenced the executor refused to refer the claim is prima facie conclusive on the court.[91]

[§ 2280] (cc) Time of Commencing Suit. If claimant commences his action before the expiration of the time allowed the representative by statute for filing his consent to refer the claim to the surrogate, he waives his right to costs.[92] After the action has been commenced the filing of the consent specified by the statute would be a useless formality.[93] On the other hand, if claimant brings his action after the expiration of the statutory period for filing the consent, and he recovers judgment, he will be entitled to costs, although the action was commenced before the expiration of the statutory period within which he must have brought his action.[94]

[§ 2281] (3) Where Representative Personally Interested in Litigation. The mere fact that a representative is personally interested in a suit brought by him in his representative capacity will not render him personally liable for costs in case the suit is unsuccessful if the suit was one which it was his duty to bring in a representative capacity and he was not guilty of mismanagement or bad faith.[95] It has been held, however, that representatives contesting for their own interests the claims of heirs are bound in case of failure to pay the costs of the suit;[96] and where an executrix who is also a legatee appeals from a judgment in her individual capacity as legatee she cannot claim the benefit of a statute providing that costs shall only be taxed against an executor personally in case of mismanagement or bad faith.[97] The personal representative does not represent the estate where he resists an attack on his settlement, and hence costs are properly taxed against him personally,[98] and the same is true of a representative who resists a suit by a beneficiary for the termination of his trust.[99] In a probate proceeding to set aside an order for the sale of real estate and for the removal of the administrator, the parties unsuccessfully opposing the granting of such relief were properly charged with a portion of the costs.[1]

[§ 2282] b. Suits in Equity. In suits brought by or against personal representatives in a court of equity costs are always in the discretion of the court.[2] Ordinarily, however, if the representative is unsuccessful in a suit brought by him in good faith he is not personally liable for costs,[3] although the bill is dismissed upon the merits.[4] On the other hand he will be personally liable in case he brings a vexatious and groundless suit,[5] or where he sues wantonly or is guilty of some willful default.[6] So where an executor institutes proceedings to be relieved from the amount charged against him in his final accounting on his being refused relief, he is liable to pay costs, although he also asks incidentally for a construction of the will;[7] and where the bill is brought merely in defense of a suit at law, a representative will not, in case of failure, be excused from costs in the court of equity in a case where costs would be given against him in the action at law.[8] He should not be allowed costs in a cause instituted by him for the purpose of having the instructions of the court upon questions which with reasonable certainty may be solved by counsel, or where they are incurred by making unnecessary

pend in whole or in part, at least, upon circumstances outside of the litigation, and not within its issues, the latter section provides that the facts must be certified by the judge or referee before whom the trial was had. parties.[9] In suits brought against a personal representative in his capacity as such he is not personally liable for costs on failure of his defense, provided it was interposed in good faith,[10] but he will be personally liable where he has interposed a vexatious or groundless defense,[11] or through his neglect the estate has lost debts;[12] and an executor who makes costs by relying upon an unreasonable objection is personally chargeable therewith.[13] Where demands against the representative individually and against him in his representative capacity have, with his consent, been contested in a single suit, in which he has been unsuccessful, the court will not discriminate as to costs, but will charge the entire amount against him personally.[14] On settlement of an estate, executors should be charged individually with the costs of suit where they have permitted a great and unwarrantable delay in the final settlement of their accounts.[15]

[§ 2283] 2. Liability of Estate—a. Actions at Law—(1) By Personal Representatives. Where an action is brought by a personal representative necessarily in his representative capacity and is unsuccessful, judgment for costs must be rendered against him in his representative capacity to be satisfied out of the assets of the estate,[16] except where he has by his own acts made himself personally liable,[17] or the action might have been brought in his individual capacity.[18] However, the rule that an executor acting in good faith is entitled to be recouped his costs of an unsuccessful action does not justify his resorting for this purpose to real estate which has been specifically devised.[19] Where an administrator fails in a suit brought by him at the procurement of a nominal defendant for such defendant's benefit and not for the benefit of the estate, the costs should be taxed against such defendant.[20]

Where the administrators of two estates join in an appeal, it is error to charge all the expenses necessarily incurred thereby to one estate.[21]

[§ 2284] (2) Actions against Personal Representatives—(a) General Rule. The general rule is that where a personal representative is sued as such and makes an unsuccessful defense, the judgment for costs should be de bonis testatoris.[22] He is liable for costs to the same extent that he is liable for the debt of the decedent, to be levied out of the assets in his hands.[23] In any event the assets
